SOMETHING MONEY CANNOT BUY

Sometimes when you feel resentful because you cannot have certain things you especially want, it will pay you to make a list of the blessings that money cannot buy. Your wealthy acquaintance may have a house you envy, but his influence cannot buy him a conscience at peace. He may have several models of expensive cars in his garage, but his wealth does not assure him the respect of his neighbors. Make out your list and think it over. You will realize that life's precious belongings are not to be bought with money.

Treasure

By MADELEINE DIAZ

SUN reflected hotly from the yellow, sandy beach of the little island Gregory walked.

Crandon was conscious of Helen's beauty.

But: "Steady there!" he said to himself. "Girls like that aren't for little boys like you, Crandon, my man to light-hearted, not at all serious com-

Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Bingham and other relatives.—Advocate.

"They were—and had been for a week—guests at the same home party—Crandon, just through football school, was taking it month's rest."

Helen was the daughter of wealth. Her clothes, her manner, everything about her showed that she came from a background of not higher intellectually than Crandon's, at least higher from the point of view of money.

It was obvious that Crandon must give in to his love for Helen. It wasn't that she was well to do, alone, that held him back. But to him she seemed about the most useless girl he had ever seen.

"Was buried treasure really found here?" she asked, as they rounded a point of the tiny, uninhabited island.

"That's the story. Might as well believe it. Some of Captain Kidd's. He blew down this way and packed it here somewhere. And there's supposed to be some of it still here."

"Yes. Mrs. Ellis told me. A man and a girl will find it."

"Yeah—so she said. Nice story for a hostess to keep tucked away in her box of tricks. Come on, race you to that next pine tree. Maybe the treasure's hidden, but anything's possible."

Helen, thought Crandon, as he watched the fleet little green figure skimming the sand at his side. Suddenly he was furious with her—furious with her for being so lovely, so alluring. And so utterly useless.

And furious with himself and with that year of hard work and little money ahead of him. Furious, too, with himself for turning away from love—rushing away from it, he thought bitterly, just as he was, running away from Helen. Out of the corner of his eye he could see her gradually lose distance as he really tried to outrun her.

He turned his head to look back—and didn't see a single hummock in front of him, though he had just passed it. The next thing he knew he was lying in an uncomfortable jumble on the sand, and sharp pains in his ankle told him that at least a bad sprain would pay him for his carelessness.

In a second Helen was at his side.

"Are you all right?" she asked, as he sat up dizzily.

"Yes. My ankle's a bit done for, though," he answered.

Helen looked at his drawn, paling face, and then knelt down beside him, putting her arm behind his shoulder. For a moment Crandon let his head sink against her soft, warm body—and for a moment he forgot the pain in his ankle as well as his vow that he would leave Helen and the house party without letting her know he loved her.

But she didn't hear his inarticulate murmur of endearment. All her attention was fixed on his ankle.

"It needs bandaging, doesn't it?" she asked.

"Yes—but—"

"You think I can't help—can't do anything useful, don't you? Her tone was a bit scornful. "Wait and see." She was gone like a flash and in a few seconds came back with the lunch basket. Crandon had been carrying on his back. "It spilled off, but it isn't hurt," she said, rummaging in it.

Quickly, with the help of a knife, she tore two big chunks of apples into good hand-sized morsels and then, under Crandon's directions, bandaged the swelling and very painful ankle. Crandon, relieved by the taut bandage, became less tense.

"What a damned good bandage. Where did you learn how to do it?"

"Where did I learn how? Oh, first at classes at school. She finished with pleasure. "Now you wait here till I get help." She gave Crandon a drink of cold water from the thermos bottle, scooped and piled up sand into a fairly comfortable rest for his back, and told him she would go back to the beach but that had brought them to the island—they had tied it in a little cove that she had seen the beach—and take it to the mainland for help.

"I'll be back soon," she said, smiling at him. "And here's the thermos of coffee and the cold water. You lie quietly and don't worry about me. I'll manage the boat." He reached out a troubled, apologetic hand, but she was out of reach, speeding down the beach without a backward look.

Help came in an hour. His host, the chauffeur and a handy man, with an improvised stretcher, and Helen. They got him on the boat without much trouble. Helen sat beside him on the trip home.

"Are you afraid to go poor, Helen?" he had softly, capturing a small, cool hand. He had realized, in that trembling, waiting hour, what her answer would be.

"No," she answered. "And you realized—that I'm not just—useless?"

"Yes—I saw that. But that's not what really matters," he said. "We found the treasure on the island, didn't we?"

"Yes," said Helen, bending well, ligg down to his.

WAX PLUCKING OF POULTRY

Important Pamphlet for Farmers and Other Poultry Breeders

The use of wax in the plucking of poultry is one of the most important steps accomplished in the market-poultry industry of Canada during the past twelve months. In this respect, no publication relating to poultry has been available with more interest than the pamphlet on this subject now being issued jointly by the National Research Council of Canada and the Dominion Department of Agriculture.

The results of extensive investigations and actual practice, embracing the preparation of birds for waxing, wax coating the birds, wax plucking brokers, reclaiming wax which can be used again and again, and indeed all the steps involved in the wax plucking of poultry suitable for use on a small scale or on the farm, are fully explained, augmented by many fine illustrations.

Wax plucking operations are simple and straightforward, and suitable equipment may be assembled from the utensils in general use on the farm. Many people who are expert at killing poultry hesitate at dressing the birds on account of the possibility of tearing and disfiguring the carcasses, more particularly those of crate-fed, well-finished poultry. With the advent of wax plucking that hesitancy has been overcome. In view of the increasing number of farmers who desire to finish and dress their poultry properly at home, a constant search has been maintained by officers of the Dominion Department of Agriculture in charge of market-poultry improvement to find ways and means of facilitating the thinking and sale of the birds over a wider period of the year, and also of decreasing the more onerous and difficult parts of the dressing operations without recourse to the elaborate and expensive equipment necessary to the wet-pluck vogue in the United States.

The Canadian officers felt that the possibilities of wax plucking dry-plucked birds were worthy of investigation and, under the direction of the Director of Research of the Department of Agriculture, officers of the Poultry Services of the Live Stock Branch conferred with officers of the Chemistry Division of the National Research Council and a cooperative project was planned. The National Research Council supplied the research specialists and the facilities for work, the Live Stock Branch the trade knowledge and laboratory assistance, and the Dominion Experimental Farms Branch the necessary live birds with which to work. The object was to find a formula for wax plucking and a method that would supplement the dry rough-pluck in use on Canadian farms and one for which the necessary equipment would be both simple and inexpensive. This has been done. Meanwhile about 140 formulas had been prepared and tested before a suitable wax and method had been evolved. Applications as to where the wax may be obtained should be addressed to the National Research Council, Ottawa. Copies of the pamphlet, "The Use of Wax in the Plucking of Poultry," by Dr. N. H. Grace, can be obtained free from the Publicity and Extension Branch, Dominion Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.
