The Stop of the Fast Mail.

"Your baby is dying, come quick, come quick!"
 Was the message flashed out in the telegraph's click
 "No train for Kenosha except the Fast Mail,
 And it does not stop." In vain was her wall:
 "My baby is dying—O, how can I wait?"
 None dare give the signal. "'Tis already late—
 The fastest and heaviest train on the road."
 In vain all her pleadings; in vain her tears flowed.

O, whirlwinds of heaven, if ever your wings
 Bear burdens in pity for suffering things,
 Stop now to the earth and with cloud-couriers wild
 Bear this agonized mother to the side of her child!

From the South rolls the thunder of the oncoming train—
 Like the tornado's rush—like the roar of the main.
 She flies to the track; she snatches her cloak,
 Red as the Sun when he goes down in smoke;
 And while the great engine comes thundering nigher,
 She whirls its bright crimson in circles of fire.

She stands in the track of the swift-coming Death;
 Her heart-pulses stopped, suspended her breath.

Down brakes: the sparks stream from brake and from wheel;
 There's a quaking of earth, there's a grinding of steel.

Still holds she aloft Danger's emblem of red;
 Still stands as one rooted to the track in her dread:
 Her face like the sheet, her eyes like the flame.

Almost to her feet in a moment Death came.
 The engineer springs to her aid in alarm,
 And she falls like one dead on his rescuing arm.

They carried her home upon pinions of steam;
 And many an eye, when her story was told,
 Was moist with the dew from an infinite stream;

And many a prayer from swelling hearts rolled—
 Unspoken petitions, recorded on high—
 That Infinite Love would not let the child die.
