Miss Isabelle McDougall, art critic of the Chicago Evening Post, addressed the Art League at the Horace Mann School on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 20. Miss McDougall talked of some of the pictures owned by the Art League and suited her address to the youthful part of her audience. These talks are specially planned for the children, though all the adult members of the league are invited and find much of interest in them. Miss McDougall took up about a dozen works of art, but dwelt longest upon those which from their subject would have special attraction for the children. She dwelt at length on the Shaw Memorial of St. Gaudens, a photograph of which belongs in the large room of the building, and told the children of Col. Shaw's unselfish career and his noble death. She next talked on the two Van Dyke autotypes which are owned by the league, telling about the little princes, children of the unfortunate Charles, and of their childish lives. She then took up the story of the little

Spanish prince, Don Balthasar, Valasquez's famous picture, a beautiful Braun autotype of which is owned by the league. She closed with a few words on some of the Italian painters. Miss McDougall held the children's attention very closely and the pictures will certainly mean more to them because of her talk.
