The High School Building.

Editor News-Letter:

Several of the tax-paying citizens of Highland Park recently paid visit of inspection to the new high school building. It is certainly, at least outside, a very fine building and ought to do great credit to Highland Park. The architectural plans are very fine, but in the mechanical part of the inside work there are some very serious defects. A building that has stood no longer than that and which has cost so much should not have cracks from a hair inch to three quarters wide. It may be an interesting question to the taxpayers whether the work has been paid for at contract price; any rate it is worth the investigation.

The plan of the building seems to be complete. There are rooms for every variety and phase of educational work. Many of these departments are valuable and appropriately should be conducted at public expense. The industrial rooms are a great feature. Then there is a room for French but why should French be taught at public expense? The supposition is that public schools are maintained for the public good, not as a private luxury, and when we come to the point why should the children be taught Latin or Greek at public expense? Will they be any better citizens for having learned to dig out Latin and Greek roots? I fail to see that they will; in fact there are some very strong arguments to prove that they will not be as good citizens when the expenses are paid by the public.

I know this is a debatable question and trust some one will make use of your columns to prove my suggestion wrong, and that Latin and Greek go to make more intelligent voters and more self-sustaining men and women. But I saw no place there to teach young women the art of good cooking, to teach them domestic economy, to teach them chemistry applied to foods, to teach them how to make children's clothes. Are not all these things just as important to our rising young women as the working room and the iron working room and the other mechanical room to the rising young men? In this connection it may not be amiss to call attention to the remarks made by Mr. Jacob Riis, of New York, in a speech before a local women's club.

Mr. Riis, whose study of social problems in cities makes him an authority perhaps second to none other on the question of social evils, especially our cities, asserts that much of the evil of drunkenness would be abated were men generally better fed and the art of good cooking more commonly understood. There could be no more potent enemy of the saloon, he pointed out, than a reform which would insure every man sufficiently and properly prepared food in his own home.

And I may here add the remark recently made by one of our great dailies: Whatever tends to health and contentment in the home life may be counted as a sure agency against drinking. To a greater extent and more directly, the element of individual health, as affected by cookery, plays its part. The poor, nourished man, the man whose health is impaired by badly prepared food, is the man who first feels the need of some artificial stimulus to keep him going. Good food would fortify him against the temptation to drink and keep him from feeling that some artificial aid was necessary.

steadying his nerves and stimulating his powers of endurance. * * * The general adoption of a policy for the promotion of good cookery would do more to abate the saloon evil than any other one of the methods now proposed or practiced. I have never been disposed to grumble about my taxes when just assessed and wisely expended. The is nothing more important in a republic than good citizenship, and good, practical education is almost an absolute necessity to good citizenship; but I cannot help feeling that if the room set aside for French and German and other foreign languages, which cannot have either any value in making good citizens or else an adverse value, if these were devoted to domestic economy and our girls taught to perform their part in making the home a nursery of all that is healthy and good and refined, it would be a severe blow to the liquor traffic.
