A LOUD CALL.

Monday morning last, May 18, just before 7 o'clock, Tony Krere, one of John H. Sheahen's milk wagon driver, started to cross the North-western tracks at Highwood near the depot, when the Green Bay train came along at full speed and struck the horse and wagon hurling the horse against one of the gate posts breaking it down and cleaned out one side of the gate keeper's cabin just passing the gate keeper himself who was getting ready to open up business for the day. By this time the horse looked as though he had just come out of a medical college dissecting room. The milk wagon was a promiscuous pile of kindling.

But, poor Tony, he was alive, as if by a miracle with his right leg broken at the ankle and the left arm at the shoulder with bruises on his head and other parts of the body, and thoroughly shaken up all over. It was a wonderfully narrow escape. Dr. Wescott attended him as the railway company's surgeon. And later he was removed to a hospital in Chicago, where at last accounts he was doing well.

Happening just before the gate-keeper entered on his day's work, the gates were open and presumably Tony supposed all was safe and the depot prevented the train men seeing him till it was too late.
