OUR BALKY HORSE.

(From Boston Evening Transcript.)
 A few days ago the writer was walking down Court Street, Boston, about one o'clock, and found a small blockade opposite Court Square. It was occasioned by a balky horse hitched to a covered express wagon. At either side of the street on the sidewalk stood a deep line of silent, interested spectators.

The driver appeared to have given up the contest temporarily, but the horse was being encouraged (?) by a ruddy-faced hack driver, who, taking the bridle in one hand, struck him repeatedly on the inside of his forelegs near the kneejoint with a stick or whip held in the other hand. As the animal steadily refused to budge, except backward or sideways, the man presently gave it up.

After a moment's wait another spectator stepped out of the crowd, walked up to the horse, kindly stroked his nose, patted him and tried to move him a bit one side for a fresh start. But the horse was in no frame of mind to accept mere blandishments of this sort, and the second comer also retired discomfited.

The crowd was still silent, watching and waiting for the right person to appear and solve the difficulty. The jam increased, but finally good sense and feeling step forward in the shape of young a man who is eating a handsome Baldwin apple for a luncheon finish. Perhaps the horse is tired and thirsty, and it is past his regular dinner hour; at all events the sight and smell of this red apple held about six inches from his nose is evidently an agreeable surprise. He pricks up his ears, accepts the proffered apple and shows his gratitude by at once moving briskly forward at the request of his new friend, and the jam is over. The crowd melts away, but many a spectator takes the lesson to heart, and will profit by it.

Nine times out of ten a horse becomes balky through harsh handling. The driver could do nothing. The two men who tried to assist him failed because they did nothing for the horse—the one thought that force would do it; the other tried blandishment. The block will continue so long as we see fit to employ such men to handle our business.

Our Philippine horse is balky, and we have made him so by ill treatment. When we send seventy-five thousand barrels of handsome Baldwin apples to the Filipinos as proof of our good will and desire to trade instead of seventy-five thousand Mauser rifle barrels as evidence of our intention to pound the life out of them, our business wagon is likely to move on again.
