

A. E. MOODY AT THE BAPTIST CHURCH.

Mr. A. E. Moody, nephew of the late Dwight L. Moody, preached last Sunday at the Baptist church.

He had a small but select and very appreciative audience and spoke from the text, "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory which shall be revealed."

Mr. Moody's voice was low and well modulated, his handling of his text thoughtful and as one of his hearers who is also one of the most prominent women of Highland Park, remarked, "he always has something to say that is worth hearing."

He is more scholarly than his celebrated uncle, more quiet, more deliberate and what the world would call altogether more refined in speech and manner than his uncle was.

Yet notwithstanding all these advantages he could never fill a house as his uncle could nor attract the enormous following that gave the name Dwight L. Moody, magic power to sway multitudes.

The reason is obvious. The uncle had what is called "magnetism," which is perhaps but another word for intense earnestness.

The nephew lacks altogether what is called, "the artistic temperament." He is not quick to perceive a telling point and dwell upon it. He is not himself on fire with personal enthusiasm. He is calmly convinced of the truth of christianity and thoroughly persuaded of the world's need of it; yet he has no overwhelming passion of adoration for divine perfection such as made his uncle famous without any of the aids that the world can give or take away.

Mr. A. E. Moody said in his Sunday morning sermon what was good, what was true, what was necessary, what was indeed indisputable, but he lacked artistic instinct to dwell upon what was effective and ignore what was commonplace.

His dwelling upon the word "reckon," in the endeavor to twist some occult meaning out of it, was especially jarring to those sensitive to "the eternal fitness of things."

The undue prominence given to the word "reckon," while considerations of so much more importance were thrust aside, was painful to a degree.

He had the red robe of martyrdom, worn by those who endure "the sufferings of this present time," to talk about.

He had a golden opportunity to offer wine and oil to the bruised and "fallen by the wayside."

He should have had a vision of "the glory that shall be revealed" to paint for worn watchers weary of waiting for the morning.

Yet while the congregation waited for the consolation of these utterances he asked them to consider the word "reckon" in all its possible and impossible meanings.

The office of a critic is never a desirable one; yet from our critics we learn that which it is most important for our advancement that we should know; and is it not Emerson who bids us side with our critics and learn from them that we may make what they say of us no longer true?
