Although few Highland Park people were in attendance, a great deal of interest was centered on the annual hunt ball at Onwentsia Club, Lake Forest, on Friday a week ago. The decorations were emblematic of the hunt, and the dining room bore the color scheme of red and white. The candles bore red shades, and red flowers were used in abundance, while later in the evening, many of the favors dispensed during the cotillion carried out the same color effect. Preceding the dance was the usual dinner. The regular dance program began at ten o'clock and the cotillion followed at midnight, Mr. Howard Gillette leading.

all animals. No longer would he scour the woods in freedom and laugh with scorn at his pursuers, at last he was captured!

Charles realized all this in a moment. His heart filled with joy as he looked upon his prize. It was the work of but an instant to remove the fox from the iron jaws of the trap, and before long Charles was hurrying back to the camp with his trophy. He reached there just as the camp was beginning to stir.

"Merry Christmas!" he cried, as he held the beautiful animal before them. "Jimmie, here's the present Santa Claus left for you."

A shout went up in the cabin, and all the men gathered around to examine the beautiful creature.

It was a very merry Christmas day, for, although so far out in the woods, the lumbermen had the Christmas spirit as they sat around, smoking their pipes, laughed at one another's boyhood tales.

"Though Jimmie, was almost as happy as any boy could be, Charles joy was unbounded, for he was continually thinking of the money he was to receive.

When he received it, he divided it with Jimmie, for he claimed that without that young person's bright eyes, the prize would never have been his.

As for Jimmie, he might have enjoyed a lot of tin soldiers more than the money, but certainly nothing else could have been more useful to either of the boys or their father than the sum they received for the long sought for skin of the Silver Fox.
