Profit in Poultry

No other business connected with agricultural life seems so attractive as poultry farming. Even those who fail in the business and retire from it aver that they are certain they could succeed in a new trial. In the beginning the general idea is that the business consists of throwing out corn with one hand and gather in eggs with the other. While this may be true in a sense there are many little things one must do in connection with this. One can keep a small flock of hens with profit, while one could not double or treble this number successfully, because with a large number all the difficulties which arise, such as want of cleanliness, vermin, impure air, and rise of infection, increase in a much larger ratio than does the number in the flock. But if we have succeeded with a small flock, there is no reason why we should not be able to do so with several flocks, if kept in the same manner as the original one.

As we increase our number of fowls, the greatest caution must be observed in each house or pen. We believe as much depends on the management of chickens as on the characteristics of the different breeds. It is of great importance that the young fowls should, at the close of the day, have full crops. The nights are long, and as soon as the chickens have digested all their food they stop growing for the time being. It is a very good plan to feed them as late in the day as they can see to eat and as early in the morning as possible. They crave a variety of food; there is nothing better than plenty of good, clean, sweet grain, such as corn, wheat, oats, millets, barley, etc. A mash once a day made of skimmed milk thickened with ship stuff and a portion of good meat meal thoroughly mixed, and made quite dry, is excellent for them; also sunflower seed fed very sparingly is of great benefit to chickens through the moulting season.

The greatest profit in poultry is from early hatched chicks and winter eggs. We may have them plentifully if we will give our hens good care during the molten season, and just keep on giving them the best of care and continue to do so all the fall and winter. —From "Poultry."
