DEEDS OF PRINTER'S DEVIL

They Are Multifarious and Exacting and No One Fills the Place Uncriticized.

A writer in a contemporary makes the following reference to his early experiences in a printing office, which is rather amusing.

"I once worked at the case for two consecutive days. I was a printer's devil then, and, for the benefit of those readers who do not know what the duties of a printer's devil are, perhaps I should explain them here.

"I used to chop up the office towel into kindling and start a fire in the printshop every morning. Another duty was to give the cat a bath in the ink keg. Part of my work consisted of washing the rollers with gasoline, and once when my clothing was reeking with gasoline, I went to near the fire and nearly exploded from spontaneous combustion. I also used to feed the press every day—I always fed the press about four p. m.—we read the press only once a day—I used to feed it with various things just to find out what it liked best, but I didn't feed the office cat although I got credit for that. As a matter of fact, the cat had no business to go to sleep on the press bed. I recollect that day there was a likeness of the flattest cat you ever saw on the first page. When I didn't have anything else to do I used to pie type.

"I said I worked at the case two days. I did, and I mixed up the types in the boxes to such an extent that the boss put the whole business in the 'hell-box' and told me to go there, too. He told me frankly he didn't think a kid and wise Providence ever brought me into the world to be a printer—he said he thought I had been born just to stand around in other people's way and thus prevent them from winning obstacle races. When I forsook the art trying to balance myself on a high three legged stool while endeavoring to pick a precarious living from a lot of dinky little boxes filled with type, the printer's profession lost a valuable man, and, so far as I have been able to learn, no one yet has been able to fill my place."
