The Days Grow Shorter

Nature moves in cycles. Therefore, those incidents of our daily lives which have to do with Nature, occur with approximate regularity.

A few months ago your electric lighting bill grew beautifully less in proportion to the increased hours of daylight. The shrinkage was augmented by the departure of various members of the family for vacations, by your enjoyment of the long, dusky evenings on the porch and by numerous other causes which make electric lights less necessary during the summer months.

Likely enough, when you paid your electric lighting bill last month you noticed how these same natural causes are once more at work in inverse order, forcing your bill back to normal winter figures.

Or you will notice it this month. And when you do, just think of the added hours you are using lights, think of the added pleasure and comfort and the greater safety that follow the free use of electric current during the gloomy winter season.

And remember that your pro rata expense is the same—that it costs no more to use your electric lights or electric appliances at one season than it does at another.

The housewife who saw drudgery disappear when electric labor saving appliances came into her home, never thinks of losing their advantages during the winter months, simply because more electric current is used for lighting. She knows they cost her no more to use and are equally essential to her comfort.

The freer use of electric lights makes winter more pleasant and new pleasures and satisfaction follow the introduction of each electrical appliance into your home.

The only advice in the use of current for light or to operate appliances is advice that will suggest itself to you—DON'T WASTE THE CURRENT. SNAP IT OFF WHEN IT ISN'T NECESSARY.
