The pursuit of happiness has been the inspiring incentive of the human race. Some have sought it in the fleeting pleasures of sense, others in the study of the arts and sciences some in storm and battle, and others in the serener contests of business. Some have garnered gold and others have been content with the promise of heavenly reward. The philosopher would find it in conduct which commands his own self respect and the good opinion of his fellows. The joy of extreme happiness is rare, but contentment may be reached by all of industrious and frugal habits. Such people save for age and the rainy day. We assist you to save.
