A Matrimonial Lottery

In Which One Man Owned Most of the Tickets By DWIGHT NORWOOD

There are in various countries curious customs with regard to matrimony. In Lapland the groom must chase his bride in a foot race. In Russia, which has a very large area, with many different peoples, one and all having their own peculiar methods, there are a number of varied customs. One of these is that a girl may go into the house of any man whom she wishes to marry and remain there till he marries her. If he refuses he is considered to have insulted her and her family, and they take revenge on him if they can. Another Russian custom among a certain people is this: They have a lottery. A girl is put up as the prize. Sufficient tickets are sold to give her a dowry. The holder of the winning ticket is compelled to marry the prize he has drawn, but she may decline him. If she does they may divide between them the money paid for the tickets. If a married man is the winner he may give the prize to any bachelor he may select. In N., a village in the northern part of Russia near the Siberian border, there were four of these lotteries held each year, thus providing for four girls who had reached a marriageable age and had not the necessary dowry. The simple people of this village, buried in the heart of what might also be called a wilderness, naturally resorted to simple amusements. They were an athletic people, especially adapted to the management of animals. One of the chief recreations of the people of N. was a sort of circus in which the young men performed in gymnastics and trained animals and feats of horsemanship were exhibited. At one of these performances a slender young man named Ivan Ivanoff, with a figure fit for a statue, led the rest in riding. He would ride several barebacked horses at one time, stepping from one horse to another. Among those who looked at the feats of this young man was Nina Dimitrieff, a girl barely sixteen years old. To her Ivan, standing erect with a foot on each of two horses, guiding them wherever he wished, was the most beautiful sight she had ever beheld. When he had finished his performance and stood bowing before the plaudits of his audience Nina Dimitrieff took from her girdle a bunch of hardy flowers that grew wild in the woods of that region and threw them at his feet. He picked them up, meeting at the same time her admiring gaze. In that glance which passed between these two simple creatures was an instantaneous flash of love. No courtship was needed. The mingling of two spirits was complete. Long associations might strengthen it, as constant use will develop a muscle, but it was from that moment a perfect love. These two children—they were not much more than children—did not stop to follow out the consequences of this newborn passion, the nature of which in their innocence they did not understand. Among these people parents regulate marriages, and no marriage is permitted except where the bride has a dowry. Nina's parents could give her no dowry, and Ivan could not afford to marry her without one. Not that they would, if left to themselves, consider this as a barrier. They would consider nothing but their love and mate like a pair of doves. It was the older heads of their parents, foreseeing the wretchedness of poverty for them and their children, that would keep them apart. It was some time before their attachment was discovered, but as soon as it was known to exist Nina was forbidden to have anything to do with her young lover. For some time there were clandestine meetings, usual in such forbidden affairs. Then, the two being caught together by Nina's father, he took measures to marry her off. One of the marriage lotteries was about to come off, and he arranged that his daughter should be offered as the prize. It was a terrible blow to the lovers. A thousand chances were to be sold at 4 rubles a chance. If they were all disposed of the bride would have a dowry of 4,000 rubles, or $2,000 of our money, a very large sum in that region for a young couple with which to set up housekeeping. If the chances were not all sold the deficiency would be made up by the wealthier citizens of the village. In this case, where Nina was the prize offered, the chances would have doubtless all been sold had it not been that her love for Ivan was generally known. As it was, but a quarter of the chances had been taken up. So great was the deficiency that it was doubted whether those who usually made up such sums would do so in this case. Almost directly north of N. is Kara, in Siberia, where political offenders are sent to work in the mines. N. is the nearest town of any importance on the western side of the border between Russia and Siberia. Not long before the drawing of the marriage lottery the drawing of the mine lottery was to take place. Ivan and Nina, by a preconcerted arrangement, met in a wood to the northward of the village. The meeting was not to devise a plan, but to lament together over their approaching separation. They were in the heart of the forest under snow laden branches when, hearing a stirring in a thicket near by, they turned and saw a fate that caused Nina to shudder. It was the face of a man, but she was looking that for a moment they thought it some creature of the forest. Then a figure stepped forth, a man with unkempt hair and beard, dressed in a ragged, shabby, and eye-galling like those of a hundred bums. "My children," he said, "can you not hide me? If they see me they will take me back to the mines." Ivan had once before seen an escaped prisoner from Kara who had been pursued and arrested in N. and had never forgotten the despair on his face when, loaded with chains, he was taken away on his dismal march back to prison. Ivan knew well that this man was a fugitive, and the hearts of the children went out to him. They asked him what they could do for him, and after consultation it was arranged that they should return to the town and bring him food. This they did, and as soon as night came on they took him into the town, where Ivan hid him in his father's barn among the hay. Early in the morning a number of officials entered the town looking for an escaped prisoner. But he whom they sought was safely hidden and ministered to by Ivan and Nina. After searching the village in vain the party left, and the fugitive as well as his preservers breathed more freely. Two or three days after the officials' departure Ivan took clothes and shaving materials to the loft, and the fugitive, relieved himself of his beard, cut his hair and put on a peasant's suit. Then he asked Ivan to bring him pen, ink and paper, and he wrote a letter, which he addressed to some one in Moscow, and asked Ivan to put it in the post for him. After this the fugitive occasionally left the barn and, growing more venturesome, at last took up his quarters at an inn. He invented a story that he had a little money, with which he proposed to buy a few acres of ground, and was looking about him for that purpose. This explanation of his presence in N. was weakened by his manner, which, since he was rid of his wild appearance, marked him for a gentleman. However, the people with whom he mingled were not very acute, and even had they known that he was an escaped political prisoner would have shielded him so far as was possible. After awhile he began to receive mail, which, of course, was addressed to him under an assumed name. Meanwhile the lottery scheme by which Nina was to be disposed of dragged because so few tickets had been sold. But at last they were disposed of, and the drawing was announced to take place at once. Some curiosity was manifested to know who had taken them. But the managers of the affair would give no information. On the evening of the drawing Nina was present, as was customary for the bride, with a despairing look on her face that excited the commiseration of all. Ivan had saved enough money to pay for ten tickets. But what were ten chances in a thousand? The same as one in a hundred. He could not bring himself to attend the drawing, so he remained away. During the drawing he walked back and forth before the building in which it took place, looking up at the place where the girl he loved was to be disposed of. Presently he heard a commotion, which he believed followed the announcement of the name of the winner. A wild hope sprang up in his breast that one of his chances had won. He ran up into the hall and asked who had drawn the prize. He was told that the name was Nicholas Axelrod, but who Nicholas Axelrod was no one seemed to know. His heart felt, wringing his hands, he was about to turn away when the manager of the lottery, standing on the platform, where the drawing had taken place, advanced and read from a paper he held in his hands: "If I, Nicholas Axelrod, win the prize, being a married man, I give it to Ivan Ivanoff." Shouts arose, and cries for Ivan were heard. A man caught him by the arm as he was leaving and, turning him around, led him up to the platform where Nina sat, a smile of delight on her features. He kissed her, and the shouting broke forth anew. But who was Nicholas Axelrod? There were cries for him, but he did not respond. Persons looked about them, expecting to see him arise and make his way to the platform to receive the ovation which it was evident was awaiting him. But he did not appear, nor was he ever seen again in N. The happy couple sought him, but did not find him. It was rumored that he was a member of a noble family; that he had been pardoned by the czar; that he had been returned to Siberia. None of these rumors was ever proved. Both Ivan and his wife believe today that he bought all the unsubscribed chances in the lottery, thus having three out of four chances of winning, and that he had done this to repay them for succoring him. Nicholas Axelrod's real name was Paul Gerowsky, a Pole, whose family, related to the kings of Poland, submitted only because they were obliged to submit to the partition of their country among the three powers—Austria, Germany and Russia. But the Gerowskys did not give up hope that Poland would be redeemed and were ever watching for an opportunity to assert its reunion and independence. Some years before the marriage of Ivan and Nina, Paul Gerowsky became the leader of a plot with this end in view. It was discovered, and he was sent to Siberia. His escape from there, his sneer by the lovers, his purchase of the unsold tickets to the lottery, as has been stated, were all that was ever known of him by the people of N. Under his own name he spent the rest of his life as a citizen of the United States.

ILLINOIS NEWS NOTES
Milk Men Protest Service.
CHICAGO. — C. F. Holliday, counsel for the Central Illinois Creamery Men's club, has protested to the Illinois public utilities commission against service furnished by five railroads operating through central Illinois. The petition stated that the railroads refuse to furnish adequate service for the shipment of dairy products from points in the southern part of the state to Chicago. On the other hand, the petition sets up that the railroads are willing to furnish a sufficient number of up to date refrigerators or cars if the assignments are billed for points in the far east.
The railroads named in the complaint are the Illinois Central, Wabash, Chicago and Eastern Illinois, Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern, and the Chicago and Alton railroads.
Chicagoan Gets Juley Plum.
CHICAGO. — John J. Bradley former alderman, was named United States marshal for the northern district of Illinois, with headquarters at Chicago. This is the first big appointment to come to Chicago. Mr. Bradley succeeds Luman T. Hoy of Woodstock.
Charles A. Karch, state representative from the Belleville district, was named as district attorney for the southern district of Illinois. Mr. Karch worked with Governor Dunne's friends in the legislature. He is close politically to Fred J. Kern, president of the board of administration and a leader in southern Illinois politics. In the list of postmasters named is E. H. Little, to be postmaster at East St. Louis.
Y. M. C. A. Building Upheld.
FREEPORT, ILL. — The campaign to raise a fund for a new building for the Freeport Y. M. C. A. ended successfully when it was announced $110,000 had been pledged. This, with the money that it is expected will be realized from the sale of the present Y. M. C. A. property, will give the association $150,000 for the new structure.
College Chiefs in Convention.
BLOOMINGTON, ILL. — The tenth annual meeting of the Federation of Illinois colleges opened here. Twenty-four institutions, including Loyola, Northwestern, University of Chicago and Lake Forest, are represented. President John S. Nollen of Lake Forest delivered the opening address.
Desire to Die Realized.
AURORA, ILL. — An oft-repeated prayer of William Guernsey, who claimed to be the only survivor of "Custer's Last Rally," that he might die, has been granted. Several months ago his wife died and he was sent to the poor farm at Batavia, Ill. He was seventy-four years old.
Suspends Proposed Grain Rate.
SPRINGFIELD, ILL. — The Illinois public utilities commission has granted a further suspension until July 1 of the proposed increase of 1 cent a hundred pounds in rates on grain.
