LIFE IN THE LONG AGO.

When Huts Were Homes and Beds Were Shakedown of Straw.

For centuries the common people of England made their home in wooden huts of one room. When a family increased in numbers or wealth another hut was built beside it, or, rather, a lean-to was added and then another and another, as need required.

Sometimes they followed a straight line. At other times they were built out from the central hut at various angles. The roofs of these huts were thatched. An opening was left in the center for the smoke to escape. The fire was always built in a hollow in the center of the room. Beds were made of straw. Often they were merely shakedown in the corner. Occasionally the straw was held in a little frame resembling the ribs of a ship.

Houses built by Saxon knights were much more pretentious. They were big halls, like the Roman atrium, with a lofty roof thatched with slate or wood shingles. The floor was of hard clay. In the middle was a great fire of dry wood. The thin, acrid smoke from the fire escaped through an opening in the roof directly above the hearth.

Round the fire were long benches, on which hearthsmen and visitors sat when not fighting or at work, and talked and drank the hours through. The tables were long boards on trestles. At night the floor was strewn with straw, and like the less prosperous folk, host and visitors slept together.

CURIOUS MEXICAN TREES.

One Whose Fruit is the Counterpart of the Green Parrot.

Mexico probably has a greater range of remarkable vegetation than any other country in the world. The parrot fruit tree produces an odd shaped fruit, bearing a close resemblance to green parakeets. When the parakeet is frightened it makes a dash for the parrot tree, where it assumes a position which makes it look like the fruit itself. So close is the resemblance that their enemies, the hawks, occasionally fly by a tree on which a dozen or more of these birds are sitting, apparently unaware of their presence.

Another remarkable tree is the arbol de dinamite—dynamite tree—whose fruit, if kept in a warm place, bursts with considerable force and a loud report, scattering its flat seeds to a surprising distance.

One of the most interesting fruits in Mexico is known as the melon zapote, or papaya. It contains considerable pepsin, which reacts against both acid and alkaline conditions of the stomach, and it is said that a diet which includes papaya precludes dyspepsia. Both the fruit and the leaves possess the singular property of rendering tough meat tender. When the pulp of the fruit is rubbed over a piece of tough meat the juice attacks the fiber and softens it.—National Geographic Magazine.

The Traveling Bore.

The really well bred traveler is quiet. She does not move about in a restless fashion. She does not complain of her fellow passengers. She remembers that she is only one of many thousands who are spending their days speeding over the surface of the earth.

There is a type of traveler who is a public nuisance. She boards the train with half a dozen small bags and packages in her arms and spends perhaps the first half hour of the journey getting them settled. When she gets herself settled she finds she needs find some infinitesimal object in the particular package or box that is in the most inaccessible position. When it is disinterred she settles herself again. Then she pulls down the shade to keep the sun out of her eyes and immediately thereafter runs it to the top of the window because the train is too dark. She fidgets and fumes because of the heat and worries because of the draft and scowls at the mother of a crying baby. And she makes her fellow travelers as unhappy as she herself is unless they are endowed with an active sense of humor.

Another unpopular type is the traveler who talks in a loud tone. Fellow travelers are treated to unwelcome details of some unknown relative's toothache or forced to hear a recout of the romance of second cousin somebody's young life.

The well bred traveler speaks in a low tone and refrains from recounting any bit of news that might, not well be considered public property.

Then there is the traveler who is careless of the comfort of the other travelers.

Tennis Luncheon.

An appropriate luncheon can be given as a sequel or introduction to a tennis match. One of the most attractive was given around a table decorated in this way:

In the center of the table there was an oblong of green felt—a tennis lawn, of course. This was properly marked off with white chalk, and across the center was drawn a little net. Four small dolls dressed in white flannel were fastened to the green, and in their hands were tiny tennis rackets. To be sure, their pose was rather stolid for tennis players, but they were effective nevertheless.

The color scheme of the luncheon was green and white—with a cream of spinach puree, olives and celery, boiled halibut with white sauce and new potatoes with parsley, chicken breasts in aspic, creamed asparagus, pepper salad with cream cheese balls and wafers and tennis balls of ice cream. Of course the same balls when they are served at Christmas are dulled snow balls, but they answered their purpose.

The place cards showed little water color sketches of tennis playing, and the favors were bunches of white roses and ferns.

Public Manners.

The actions of some women in public conveyances and in public places at times invite severe criticism. Some women push and shove others in a way that suggests a state of savagery. It is a common habit of women deliberately to take another's place in line. The rule of "first come, first served" is ignored by the thoughtless majority.

Do not wrangle over paying the fare of a woman companion. Either pay it or let her pay it and then stop talking about the thing.

Women thus make themselves conspicuous in a foolish way, men laughing in a superior scorn at the weak, vacillating feminine mind. Decide to correct this error.

The action of a woman in public is the best test of her manners. After all, the behavior when there is no one looking is a fine criterion by which an individual should be rated. So be careful in public.

Courtesy For Sisters.

A large, round table at a certain famous summer hotel accommodated a family the parents of which say they never intend to grow old. Hand some themselves, they were surrounded by four beautiful children, two sons and two daughters. The mother remarked with pride that each boy had a sister to care for until he or she married.

The effect of the arrangement was plainly evident to those who noted the attention the girls received. The boys had been taught to place their sisters' chairs at the table, to help them with their wraps, to see that they had all the necessary attention at the informal hotel parties—in short, to do all those pretty things that many boys never dream of doing until they have met the "one girl," who probably is some one else's sister.

Disposing of the Spoon.

When drinking from a cup the spoon is left in the saucer. It should never be left for a moment in the cup, being used only to stir and dissolve the sugar.

Manners Make the Man.

Manners are of more importance than laws, being the foundation stones of civilization.

The Spirit of Courtesy.

Most of the rules of etiquette are based on kindness and unselfishness.
