The Curse of Mexico

Xochtl, the beautiful Indian maiden of 900 years ago, is responsible for the Mexican national drink, pulque, pronounced poolkay. She was the first to drink the sweet liquid from the maguey plant, cousin of the agave, that blooms once in 100 years. The drink in its fresh state is quite harmless, but the modern Mexicans have deluded it by fermentation, and it has now become the curse of Mexico. It appears to have much the same effect as some other national drinks, for it softens the brain, causes the digestion and paralyzes the nerves. So disastrous a food has pulque been to the poorer classes that employers of labor avoid workers from the maguey fields if they can get them elsewhere. Pittsburgh Chronicle-Telegraph

Cause and Effect

"I wonder why it is so damp and foggy in London?"
 "It is the fault of their government."
 "How do you make that out?"
 "They have such long reigns there."
