RATION AND DISTANCE

As long as we are still so remote from actual contact with the war just so long will we complain about regulations and labor. If we lived under the war regulations imposed by Great Britain for a period, we would come to the conclusion that we were not so bad off after all. There, everything has been regulated. Cream can only be obtained by a doctor's prescription, which is given when a sick child or old person needs it. Butter enough for two small slices of bread twice a day is the allowance; six ounces of sugar a week per person for all purposes, and that only by sugar ration tickets. Fowl is considered meat. Meat is scrupulously rationed. Nobody has an automobile unless he is using it for some army or relief purpose, and his gasoline is rationed even for that purpose so that he cannot use the car to go to church or for any personal requirement whatever.

Some of these regulations fall particularly hard on the British farmer yet he bears his lot with fortitude. The price he must pay for his help is regulated, the prices he can receive for his products, and the amount he may keep for his own use. In regard to his own farm products, he is rationed the same as anyone else, and cannot eat his own meat, butter or cream except in strict accord with the universal food regulations which apply to everybody.

We have not yet suffered any hardships or deprivations on account of the war. If we lived in constant expectation of a zeppelin raid, we would cease to fear for our stomachs and fear for our lives. And if we lived in constant fear for our lives, we should soon begin to see the realities that lie just beyond the clutterings of personal comfort.

To be cheerful and unselfish is the first law of the trenches. As one young writer recounts, "Their spirits effervesced. Their wit sparkled. Hunger and thirst could not depress them. Rain could not damp them. Cold could not chill them. Every hardship became a joke. They did not endure hardship, they derided it. And somehow it seemed at the moment as if derision was all that hardship existed for. Never was such a triumph of spirit over matter. As for death, it was in a way the greatest joke of all. In a way, for if it was another fellow that was hit it was an occasion for tenderness and grief. But if one of them was hit, O Death, where is thy sting? O Grave, where is thy victory? Portentous, solemn Death, you looked a fool when you tackled one of them!"

The men who are enduring the hardships of the trenches do not complain. With them the issues are too big, and all minor considerations have fallen into their proper perspective. The British people and the French people complain very little. Does it remain for the comfortable people three thousand miles away, and still untouched by suffering and hardship—is it for them to be inconvenienced and annoyed?

NOT SEEING THE CHIPS FLY

A woman whose two sons are fighting in France and who does her own house work for a large family, regrets her inability to work at the Red Cross Shop. She feels that she is not doing all of her part in this war; in fact, people of abundant leisure well qualified to judge have intimated as much.

R. L. S. told a young woman of his acquaintance, who was about to go as a missionary to China, that hers was not the temperament that makes missionaries. "You would not like," said he, "to chop all day with the butt of an ax and never see the chips fly. You would chop, and chop hard, but you would demand to see the chips."

In some of the most essential work of this war, no chips fly when we apply the ax. The first impulse of many women in this period of fluid standards, is to don a uniform or drive a motor truck—anything that is novel, abnormal and cheaply spectacular.

Could we say that these women are doing their part in the war more fully than the quiet home-keeper who feeds her family on a carefully balanced ration, and tries to solve some of the knotty problems involved in the use of substitutes? How many women have set themselves studiously to the task of discovering a satisfactory process for home bread-making? And yet this is their particular province.

The answer is that many American women demand to see the chips fly. The obvious path of duty is too drab, colorless, and devoid of thrill.

The Red Cross workers of America are doing their share in full measure. It is noble work and hard work that we could not possibly get along without in the prosecution of this war. But considering the price of foodstuffs, the imperative need of scientific knowledge of cooking, and the prohibitive salaries of servants, many of these women will find that the price of leisure for such work comes very high. Let them look at all these things before they criticize the woman who chops with all her might but whose chips never fly.

Widows and orphans in German homes are supposed to derive great consolation from the fact that the Kaiser and his six sons are still safe. Of course raising prices is an easy solution to everybody's problem but the consumer's—his problem—is raising money, and the Government may find it necessary to take him over.
