DIRECT ANCESTOR OF HEN
From the Jungle Pool Are Descended the Feathered Creatures of the Barnyard of Today.

Although there were no houses with in half a mile of the camp, we were surprised on our first night to hear cocks crowing in the jungle (Tuan previous, tropical China). Roy Chapman Andrews writes in Harper's Magazine: "The noise was like that of the ordinary hen, but more abrupt. The next morning we discovered Charrier and all his harem in a deserted rice field, and he flew toward the ju- ple in a flash of red and gold."

I dropped him and one of his hens with a right and left of "axons" and found that they were jungle fowl (Gallus gallus) in full plumage. The cock was a splendid bird. The long neck feathers (hackles) spread over his back and wings like a shimmering golden mantle but were hardly more beautiful than the black of his under parts and green glossed tail. Picture to yourself a "black-headed red game-cock," and you will have him to all his glory except that he fell in drooping and he is more shaggy. In his general bearing, the female was a trim little bird, with a lilac tinge to her throat feathers, and looked exactly like a well-tkept game-bantam hen.

The jungle fowl is the direct ancestor of our barnyard hen and rooster, which were probably first domesticated in Burma and adjacent countries long before the dawn of authentic history. According to tradition, the Chinese received their poultry from the West about 1400 B. C., and they are figured in Babylon cylinders be- tween the sixth and seventh centuries B. C. Although they were probably introduced in Greece through Persia, there is no direct evidence as to how and when they reached Europe.

BUILT FOR SHALLOW WATER
Regular Marine Installation on New England Coast Was Known in 1922 as the Camel.

In the year 1922 a queer marine in- stitution made its appearance in Nat- tucket and bore the name of camel. These camels were really huge floating dry docks for carrying ships over the bar, where the depth of water had been gradually decreasing since 1880. Being flat-bottomed the camels could float in water very much shallower than a loaded ship required. They were like two long, large boxes float- ing side by side and held together at the ends by large iron chains.

The outer sides were almost straight up and down, but the inner sides were curved, making when the two sections were drawn together, an interior basin just the shape of the bottom of a ship.

About the most dangerous occupa- tion in the world seems to be that of being an "acc."

New potatoes. It seems, are now defined as potatoes that have never been used before.
