THE LAST REDOUBT

President Wilson rejects the enemy peace offer and again refuses to "come to terms with a people without honor."

The United States and the allied armies, when the time comes, will dictate any terms that may be, and General Poch, the generals of the allies, and the armies in the field will not see the fruition of all their strategy and labor arrested in the very hour of victory. "Let them push on," say thousands of telegrams to Washington from every part of the country. And they are pushing on.

Making promises is one of the easiest things Germany does. The allied armies are pressing the enemy back from various sectors. If they had but had time—a little respite—they could concentrate their forces for a last attack. They want time to centralize what remains of their strength against an invasion of their own territory, for so far this drama of death, suffering, and abomination has never been staged on German soil. When it is—when their hour has sounded—then they want their forces to the last man for defense.

What could be easier than to ask the patient, long-suffering Uncle Sam for an armistice?

What says their great philosophic advisor, Nietzsche, for such a contingency? In his work, "Beyond Good and Evil," he answers the question: He says, "there are no absolute values 'good' and 'evil'; these are mere means adopted by all in order to acquire power to maintain their place in the world, or to become supreme. It is the lion's good to devour the antelope. It is the dead-leaf butterfly's good to tell a foe a falsehood. For when the dead-leaf butterfly is in danger, it clings to the side of a twig, and what it says to its foe is practically this: 'I am not a butterfly, I am a dead leaf, and can be of no use to thee.' This is a lie which is good to the butterfly because it preserves it."

"Once the most favorable order of conduct is found, proved efficient and established, it becomes the ruling morality of the species that adopts it, and bears them along to victory. All species must not and cannot value alike, 'for what is the lion's good is the antelope's evil and vice versa.'"

"Concepts of good and evil are therefore, in their origin, merely a means to an end, they are expedients for acquiring power."

Applying this principle to mankind, Nietzsche attacked Christian moral values. He declared them to be, like all other morals, merely an expedient for protecting a certain type of man. In the case of Christianity this type was, according to Nietzsche, a low one.

The morality of the powerful class, Nietzsche calls "noble" or "master-morality;" that of the weak and subordinate class he calls "slave-morality." In the first morality it is the eagle which, looking down upon a browsing lamb, contends that "eating lamb is good." In the second, the slave morality, it is the lamb which, looking up from the sword, bleats dissentingly, "eating lamb is evil."

We are thankful, before God, that so far we have been able to reverse some of this specious philosophy, and to declare that "eating lamb is evil" without either "looking up" or "bleating." And we hope to see the day when the American Eagle, though scorned to devour the prey in its talons, will yet teach these unlikable philosophers that "there are things in heaven and earth as yet undreamed of in their philosophy," and prove to them that even the eagle can teach the elements of mercy to the thing at his mercy, provided that thing be kept strictly within the shadow of his wings.

A CASE IN QUESTION

One day last week a young woman of Highland Park made the acquaintance of a soldier on the way home from her place of employment. After strolling with the stranger for several blocks, and finding herself on the outskirts of the town in a comparatively uninhabited section, she became alarmed at her own foolishness. Her companion proved to be a young man without even the rudiments of honor and wholly untrustworthy so that the young woman was put to the ignominious necessity of appealing for deliverance from her hasty friendship.

It is rare that a woman is molested on the streets of this city, or indeed of any city, unless she evidences some willingness in that direction. The soldiers are treated too well, are offered too many social opportunities to insult a young woman deliberately who is going about her business. On the other hand, there are always young men of low type who are seeking out the silly flirtatious girl wherever she is to be found. Such girls are subject to insult, and while in the present instance, the man was of a brutal type, the girl has had a lesson which she and many others will do well to profit by.

It is, however, a regrettable fact that well-meaning young women, in the face of all the opportunities for meeting these young men in uniform under favorable conditions and in wholesome surroundings, should prefer to "pick up" acquaintanceship on the street. The natural verdict in such a case is that it is her own fault and let her abide the consequences. And very often this is true, but on the whole, it is a verdict not always as just as it is easy to pronounce. Unforeseen things enter into these human equations. A girl may be forbidden by narrow-minded parents or relatives from going out to places of wholesome entertainment in the evenings, and even from entertaining young friends in her home. Under such inhibition, it becomes a pitiful probability that the young woman may pick up acquaintances on her way home from work.

R. W. SNOW TELLS "ROAD TO PEACE"
(Leading editorial in Chicago Evening Post of October 15th.)

The war will be longer and more blood will be shed if the fourth Liberty loan fails to go over the top. Bernard W. Snow, one of the noonday speakers for the Liberty loan committee today told an audience of women assembled in Calumet Hall, Sixty-second and Cottage Grove ave., under the auspices of the Women's Catholic Order of Foresters.

The shortest route to peace, he said, is to enlist as a "plus" subscriber. The American Army in France, he declared, which is winning laurels for the nation, is only the first army. He told the women that the people at home made up the second army which must back up the first army, and can only do so by making the Liberty loan drive a success.

"This," he said, "is the shortest road to peace. This is the best thing we have come to understand in the dependence which each of us has upon the other. We have learned that the interest of one of us is the interest of all of us. We know now that the sons of the men at the front are to shoulder with the sons of the bravest workers of this plant the same battle, enduring the same hardships, giving their lives in the same manner, and that every boy, no matter what rank of life he comes from, is making his sacrifice for the benefit of the good of us for the equal benefit of all of us."

"In this time of our greatest need the men made of your sons who are in the firing line of France and the other battle fronts and every one of us at home who are the second line of defense. The events of the last two weeks have shown us that our army in France, with a scant year of military training, a man for man the master of a German machine gun, has bested forty years of intensive training."

"From Christ to Thierry to the Liberator Argentine heroes have shown us that the spirit of any fighting man that the world ever knew, he can rely absolutely on the courage, energy and fighting spirit of our first army. This drive for the fourth Liberty loan will determine whether our country will win the war and the sons of the men who are equally ready to obey their orders and perform their duty."

"We have no doubt that you will be glad to see the boys who are in the firing line of France and the other battle fronts and every one of us at home who are the second line of defense. The events of the last two weeks have shown us that our army in France, with a scant year of military training, a man for man the master of a German machine gun, has bested forty years of intensive training."
