Good Coffee?
Sure
Who doesn't?

Well, not in all, of course, but in a great many electrified houses conventional coffee pots are in the discard, for the understanding spreads that the Percolation System extracts the true flavor of the berry and therefore secures good coffee—the best coffee.

Reading for Leisure Hours
"Love Stories," for springtime reading, are seven entertaining tales by Mary Roberts Rhinehart. If you should have to pick them up to review them, you would find yourself absorbed in reading them. You wouldn't just dip into them, you would be quite scandalously interested in Jane, and the Dummy, and the Interne, and all the others. It is sparkling, and fresh with humor, tenderness and sweet gaiety.

"The Days that Shook the World," written by John Reed who lived those ten days in Russia which was most powerfully shaken. He had an interview with Kerensky just before his government fell, and knows the Bolshevik revolution in its full significance. He is a newspaper man and the book is a vivid and lively record of events. Do you want to know more about Russia? Here is your chance.

Another Western story always received with pleasure, "A Man Four-Square," by Raine, is rattling story of the adventures in the Wild West of a "mad man" who is "square" with excitement and bun-play galore. If you like a hero who is a hero, and a story crammed full of adventure, this is a book after your own heart.

"The Cause is Bigger than its Mistakes" says the hero of Kauffman's new novel, "Victorious." If we could only hold that faith, might not our cause, our little individual cause turn out victorious? Then might we not all rebuild together? as they did? It is a big novel of America's participation in the war, and it has never been published serially.

"Women in American History," is a collection of biographies of Women of the United States, told by Grace Humphrey who handled the dry facts of the "History of Illinois" so admirably and entertainingly (almost beyond belief, but true, nevertheless). Two of them are Indian women, some of whom we have heard their friends speak recently (Julia Ward Howe and Harriet Beecher Stowe), others are Betsy Ross, Clara Barton, Lucretia Mott, etc.

"The Lords of the Wild" is another of Altscheler's thrilling French and Indian war stories that his young readers liked so much. The scenes are laid on Lake George and that famous region which is so beautiful, and which may be more famous today for the first civilian training camp at Plattsburg.

"General Crook and the Fighting Apaches" is a new addition to the famous "Trail Blazers Series." The others are "Opening the West with Lewis and Clark," "Buffalo Bill and the Overland Trail," "On the Plains with Custer," and "With Carson and Fremont."

"The Web," by Emerson Hough is a story of the home guard of Secret Service in the recent war. How thousands of American business men became detectives to help win the war is truth stranger than any fiction.

"Jack the Kaiser Killer," who came to us in "Treat 'em Rough," promises to give the real dope, from overseas. He threatens "What I tell you I seen myself where if you read it in a newspaper you don't know it's guess work." Lardner's humor is universal, it doesn't depend on time or place or circumstance. The Great American Humorist comes and the Great American Humorist goes, but at the present moment Ring W. Lardner is up to bat.

However, the Canadian humor of Stephen Leacock is always seized upon with unabated delight. The new volume from his riotous pen is "The Hohenzollerns in America... and Other Impossibilities." He proposes that the proper punishment for Hohenzollerns and Hapsburgs is that they WORK, work out their destiny. There be some among us who would not grant to them such a haven of sojace, but in his characteristic vein of humor Mr. Leacock presents also a searching satire on the vanity of autocratic monarchy.

Has anyone ever "gotten your goat?" Then you'll understand, and want to read "Goat Feathers" by Ellis Parker Butler who wrote "Pigs is Pigs." Goat feathers are the little distractions that take your time from the real business of life and make you look like a goat. It's a gem! Read it.

"Lady Larkspur" by Meridith Nicholson is an after the war story, a mystery, a foreign count, "Aunt Alice's" fan, an official of the State Dept. and a prisoner in the tool-house all are woven together into a romance of that fanciful charm in which Mr. Nicholson excels.

"Accounting as an Aid to Business Profits," by William R. Bassett, is published by the A. W. Shaw company, which should be recommended enough of its stable worth. It carries all the worth which it promises, and a little bit more. Telling how much accounting you really need, the essentials of book-keeping, opening your books, how to figure the cost of labor, accounting for the man who sells personal service, and many other phases of the work, it is full of ideas of practical value, abundantly illustrated.

Riding on the superstition of the white horse and the red-haired girl, Kenyon Gambier has written a novel of the time when young love came to captured Belgium. There is a hero, Peggy, and a heroine Yvonne, and a dashing American lieutenant, with German rogues a-plenty. There are puzzles and mistakes, and Oh! the worry o' the heart! Forced to land behind the enemy lines in Belgium, the hero is embraced by a beautiful English girl on the street and greeted as husband. She takes him to dinner with a Belgian woman, who fights violently with a German officer of remarkable leanings toward the enemy. A stimulated love strikes deep roots under the stress of common danger and sacrifice. "The White Horse and the Red-Haired Girl" promises entertaining reading.
