

Coffee Made by the Percolation Process

It's a beverage that extracts the fragrance of the berry and all of its good qualities. Mark the distinction—good qualities. It's important. The true essence of coffee is not secured in the ordinary boiling operation that produces a fluid containing more or less tannic acid. This fact is set forth in easily accessible scientific reports which also fix the high place of percolation in the list of preparation methods.

Percolation requires for its success a constant degree of heat properly applied. The best example of a machine in which this result is invariably achieved is
