The Law of Progress

is as unchangeable as the famous laws of the Medes and the Persians.

The individual who spends more than he earns—or, as is far too often the case, spends all before he earns—travels in a hopeless circle. He cannot advance, and "he who does not advance, recedes."

The person who saves BEFORE he spends inevitably registers progress. Why not put the principle to the test?

THOSE WOUNDED MEN

It would not have been possible, two years ago, to imagine a condition in this country where the men who fought in the Great War had become a matter of indifference. True, the thing happened in the Civil War. It was a war of young men like this war. It had its heroes, magnified far beyond life-size, like this war. Those young men, those strong vigorous bodies were cruelly maimed and disfigured just as they are now, in our day; and the people of that distant day lamented their infirmities, idolized them and then forgot, just as they are doing today.

A great English writer, foreseeing this approaching apathy of the whole civilized world, wrote this prophecy for ten years hence:

"I see that world gazing back, like a repentant drunkard at his own debauch, with a sort of horrified amazement and disgust. I see it impatient of any reminiscence of this hurricane; hastening desperately to recover what it enjoyed before life was wrecked and pillaged by those blasts of death. Hearts which now swell with pity and gratitude when our maimed soldiers pass the streets, will, from sheer familiarity, and through natural shrinking from reminder, be dried to a stony indifference. 'Let the dead past bury its dead' is a saying terribly true, and perhaps essential to the preservation of mankind. The world of ten years hence will shrug its shoulders if it sees maimed and useless men crawling the streets of its day, like winter flies on a window pane."

And yet this same writer had faith in the men and women who were carrying on the great work of restoration for these disabled men. He considered their devotion, courage, their technical skill, as things beyond question, and the unselfish idealism which animated them, something not to be measured in terms of praise.

The only thing that was greatly to be feared in carrying on this work of physical and mental reconstruction was the lack of co-operation on the part of the people whose sacred duty it was as well as theirs. But it was the lot of the workers to live each day with the problems which presented themselves, to suffer and struggle and note the gradual results of their hands. The people were removed from this actuality. Their contact could not be first-hand. They would be cut off from the moral benefits of direct service.

We have here in Highland Park a most excellent work for the disabled men which is going steadily forward. We see all too little of this work and its far-reaching benefits. True, we contribute our money to the Army and Navy Center, but we do not visit the Center. We do not familiarize ourselves with the work there, and put our hearts and hands into its daily activities. Those who do, and there are many who do, know the value of this institution for the disabled soldier. They know the problems of the manager, his consecration to his work, his understanding of the men who come and go. All those who know the Center as a home for disabled men, would wish to perpetuate that great work. Only those that do not know the work would dream of discounting its importance. The disabled men who have served their country are a part of our heritage of the war. As long as they are here, they are our guests. Let us not fall into the sin of apathy on their behalf.

BOYS MAKE THEIR OWN BOBS

Winter sports in Highland Park this year have stimulated the ingenuity of the young boys of the town. A visit to the municipal slide at Fairview hill reveals the fact that almost every bob there has been made by hand by the boys, the reason being, as they allege, that the ready-made bobs are too high and not strong enough.

Many a bob has been made at the High School, runners and all, in the forge and the shops. Some of them measure fifteen feet in length, of a fine selected timber, that is calculated to stand the strain. Indeed, the bobs at Fairview hill furnish a fair example of the excellent work which is being done in the shops at Deerfield-Shields.

"DEAR BRUTUS" NOW PLAYING AT ILLINOIS

At last Chicago is seeing one of the most fascinating of the J. M. Barrie plays, "Dear Brutus," which is now running at The Illinois. This play had a long run in the east, and was so widely heralded that Chicagoans who did not see it in New York were obliged to wait a year for it to come to them. However, things have a way of coming to Chicago in the end, if the people only wait long enough.

This is one of the Barrie plays which is more enjoyable, if read before seeing the performance. William Gillette appears in the title role.
