

After Eight Years They Can Say—

"The requirements for a storage battery which will give reliable and uninterrupted service and long life, and which has an overload capacity enabling it to perform without strain the sudden and severe task repeatedly imposed upon it in cranking an engine, are met in the Cadillac Exide battery with a competence unique in the storage battery field. The storage battery, which has been regarded by many motorists as the weakest link in the electrical system, a vital but often undependable element, is, in the Cadillac, the equal of any other part of the car. It is exclusively Cadillac, and to the best belief of the Cadillac Company, its quality cannot be duplicated, particularly in length of service."

(From Cadillac Details of Construction)

The Cadillac was the first to introduce an electrical system of cranking and lighting.

"Exide" Batteries were used upon the very first car—and are used today—because they serve a great car well.

It's a really great battery on a really great car.
