In Reality, I Answer Your Call, Very Promptly. The real measure of damage due to poor telephone service is in loss of time or in the personal inconvenience caused.

Speed is a relative term that depends upon what one is used to rather than upon what one actually requires or expects. In telephone practice high speed is taken for granted; if telephone calls had never been answered by the operator in less than thirty or forty seconds, it would still be not only the quickest service in the world but it would seem the quickest.

The remarkably fast service the telephone companies have created and maintained so steadily has made fifteen and twenty seconds seem a long time—but only as regards telephone service.
