POULTRY AND DISORDER

Economy experts tell us to keep hens, but many people decline to do so, for fear of getting disorderly back yards. It must be admitted that Old Mother Hen does not usually contribute much to realize the Town Beautiful idea. She does not comprehend that her fluffy plumage looks far better on her own back than when scattered over the ground. Also she regards green grass as a kind of weed to be thoroughly eradicated.

Yet some people can keep poultry with an air of style. They are not too tired to use the paint brush. Who could expect that a hen kept in a weather beaten old coop, would feel cheerful enough to lay any eggs? A touch of bright paint might so relieve her depression that she would go to work with some industry. And when you take a flock of chickens all one breed and color, they have the smart aspect that goes with any kind of regular uniformity. Perhaps the speckled hen's principles of order have been contaminated by too long and intimate association with the human race.

Spring fever, like hay fever, can only be cured by the passing of the season.

The long faced man admits openly that he is a poor sport. Smilers have their share of griefs, too.
