THE LOST ART OF WALKING

In the good old days before the speed demon ruled in the land people used to walk because they enjoyed it. They took leisurely rambles into the country on Saturdays and holidays and rested under the shade of trees and ate their luncheons beside the banks of the streams and explored the hills and climbed the mountains.

They came to have an intimate knowledge of nature, of the trees and flowers and birds, they came home in the evening with their lungs filled with fresh air and with healthy appetites for supper.

It was so that the pilgrims used to fare forth to Canterbury or to Lourdes and it is so today in Japan where on every road in summer one meets merry bands of wayfarers with their pilgrim hats and staves on their way to Nikko or to Fuji or some other mountain shrine. The pilgrimage is only an excuse for vagabondage and leisurely sight seeing.

George Borrow is the modern apostle of the open road, and "Lavengro" and "Romany Rye" and "Wild Wales" are not read today as they ought to be because people have forgotten how to wander abroad and to take their pleasure deliberately and naturally.

Today we rush over the roads in motor cars and come back again choked with dust and stifled with the fumes of gasoline. The motor car has its unquestioned uses, but it has also come to be a popular obsession like jazz and dancing and the movies.

A modern writer treating of mob psychology and crowd contagions includes motoring among the manias which have taken possession of our people, people who are forever rushing off somewhere only to turn around when they get there and rush back again. It is like a modern dance of dervishes, endlessly whirling and spinning.

The motor car, we repeat, has its proper uses, and they are great and many; it is not of these we are speaking but of its abuses. It will come to pass someday, we devoutly hope, that people who can not afford to buy automobiles will go without them and will recover the healthy satisfaction of leisurely perambulation, they will recover the natural use of their legs which now are in danger of becoming atrophied and will live longer and be happier.

SANCTUARIES OF WILD LIFE

We have observed in certain districts of the south to which the birds resort in winter, sign boards along the roadsides announcing that the region is a bird sanctuary and that it is unlawful to injure or disturb them, and the birds seem to know that they are protected and show no fear when they are approached, as they do in other districts where they are harassed and slaughtered.

Here in Highland Park now that summer has come with its ardent heats, we love to be out of doors under the shade of the trees and we delight in the wide lawns and open spaces which make our town such a pleasant place at this season of the year and we enjoy the confidence of the birds and squirrels who go about on their lawful occasions, nesting and rearing their young without fear and little concerned at our approach as if they knew that we would not harm them. Our little furred and feathered friends soon come to know when we are well disposed toward them and they quickly respond to our friendly advances.

Highland Park is a sanctuary of wild life in a very real sense although it is not formally established as such, and our children are taught from the very first to know and love the birds and to watch for their coming and to observe their habits and to protect and care for them. They are taught, too, to know and love the wild flowers which abound in our beautiful ravines and to protect them. They grow up with an intimate knowledge of nature and her ways which adds to the joy of life and widens the horizons of their minds.

For all this we have chiefly to thank their good friend, Mr. Jesse L. Smith, who himself is an ardent nature lover and who imparts to the children of his school his own fine enthusiasm for nature and out of doors.

"He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all."

The members of the cast were Elizabeth Doty, Baron Rockwell, Dorothy Reay, Marion Smith, Lenore Ray, Robert Peck and Edith Carlson.

Don't cheat yourself and your school just because you don't study now. Its not what you knew last fall but what you know now that counts. Have you paid for your annual yet?
