BARBARISM POSES AS ESTHETICISM

A subscriber has asked that the following editorial from the April 18 issue of the New York Times be republished in this newspaper, "So that the uninformed or merely thoughtless may realize the harm they are doing, and refrain from their ruthless picking."

One of the queer delusions that find a place in the human mind is the belief that the picking of wild flowers evidences a love of "nature" and an appreciation of beauty, and that to do it gives evidence of culture, refinement and virtue. Children are not only allowed, they are encouraged, to utilize every opportunity thus to despoil the fields, and fond parents are proud of the success their offspring achieve in this highly deplorable form of destructiveness. Since the automobile came into such general use, the extermination of the wild flowers has been greatly hastened, for now the ravagers are not limited to the fields and woods close to towns, as before, but the whole countryside has been made accessible to them, and, as if they could not do enough harm themselves, they are paying the rural children—who, if left alone, would rarely indulge in this kind of vandalism—to bring the flowers to the roads.

The season when the most mischief can be done is just beginning, and already there can be seen cars heavily loaded not only with blossoms gathered one by one, but also with great branches ruthlessly stripped from Spring flowering trees and shrubs. Very little of this loot is carried home, or can be. Most of it withers within an hour and is thrown away, but apparently no compunction is felt.

Instead of showing delicacy of sentiment and a well developed esthetic sense, the wild-flower pickers and buyers reveal that they are utter barbarians. They do not hate the blossoming plants, but the effect is exactly the same as if they did, for these frail products of rain and sun lack the fighting power of the so-called weeds, and if not allowed to live their highly specialized lives in the places that suit them, they give up in despair and vanish forever. Thus went the fringed gentian, and thus is going—is almost gone—the arbutus, or Mayflower. The latter is eagerly bought by country-born city folk as reminders of youth, but if they were wiser and more considerate they indignantly would refuse to foster a trade quite as vicious as is that in the egret's nuptial plumes.

Closely related to the picking of wild flowers out in the country is the devastation suffered by the city parks. So easily explicable as to be almost pardonable is the hunger of the tenement dwellers for something green or gayly colored to take home; but they sin in deepest ignorance when they do this, and they rob themselves when they draw from the sound belief that the parks belong to the people the false conclusion of a right to appropriate to private enjoyment anything the parks contain.

In the Times on Sunday Dr. Straubmuller, President of the New York School Garden Association, told a terrible tale about an east side park where several thousand plants were set out one day to form an encircling hedge, and that night every one of the plants was taken away! He, too, however, said that the automobilists were the worst offenders, and added that of the automobilists the women were the most ruthless because their misguided love of flowers was stronger than that of men.
