VOICES OF LAKE AND FOREST

In the voices of the lake and of the forest these late summer days sound already faint warnings of the coming of the season when dark, storm-tossed waters and stark, shivering trees, stripped of their wealth of summer foliage, must face the rigors of winter and the sterner phases of the never altered yet always changing process of the seasons.

The forest still bravely flaunts its green plumes in the face of inevitable death; the sunlight still dances on the little waves that ripple a path of golden glory straight into the gorgeous gateway of the west. The little breezes that skip from wave to wave down the glittering way come whispering among the forest trees, and somehow there is a sinister tinge to their voices as they go skipping among the tree tops; the laughing zephyrs that touched the sun drenched waters have become the wind sighing in the pines for the summer that is almost gone. The sunlight dies across the lake and the bright waves gleam no longer, but roll in long, dark ridges ever shoreward, as the gentle wash of sun-kissed wavelets upon gleaming beaches strikes a harsher note forboding of that time when winter's roaring billows come smashing in thunder diapason upon a bleak barren coast sending the somber voice of the winter lake reverberating through the barren forest that answers with stricken tones of the winter wind.

But the never-changing, ever-changing year brings compensation. The winter world will soon lie white and cold across the graves of the flowers and the beds of the fallen leaves. Yet these children of warmth and light are not dead but sleeping. There is always the promise of the new birth of springtime, when nature comes again rejoicing bringing her wealth of gifts to cheer from age to joy-filled age the much-blessed life of man. The little new buds will soon again give promise of green plumes flaunting on every hill; the sunbeam dancers soon will bathe their twinkling feet again in the gleaming glory of the sunset path across the sky-painted lake; the breezes will return to whisper of hope and the fulfillment of dreams down the forest avenues and the forest trees, too, will whisper back the promise of dreams come true.

The lake and the forest have many voices rounding out the perfect harmony of the circling year. Just now they are swelling to magnificent climax the glorious chorus of praise for the blessings of the summer that is gone, and promise for the summers yet to be.

IS GREAT LAKES DOOMED?

In a quiet but effective manner the faction opposed to the Great Lakes Training station has succeeded in practically "closing" the place. A few days ago when Rear Admiral Moffett visited the station, he was surprised and chagrined to see the desolation that had been wrought. From a first class active naval base, peopled with 60,000 sailors, Great Lakes has dropped to a training school for a mere handful of sailors. It is said that there are at present only 500 men at the station.

All this has been brought about against the desire of people of the north shore and those in charge at the station. Congressman Carl Chindblom has waged a hard but apparently unavailing fight against the "higher-ups" who demand that Great Lakes be practically dismantled. Mr. Chindblom and others who have opposed this move have valiantly struggled to keep the station with its millions of dollars worth of the people's investment from being practically boarded up, but have had small success. Congress has repeatedly refused to make sufficient appropriation for Great Lakes. Various organizations along the north shore are cooperating with Captain Waldó Evans and other officials at the station in their efforts to bring back to Great Lakes some measure of its old prosperity. It is hoped that their efforts will be successful.
