MOVING TIME

If anybody has conceived the idea that the world is not moving these spring days, let him straightway mend his viewpoint. Look up the street any time nowadays and see a man with a bird cage and a floor lamp, or a picture of Pickett's charge at Gettysburg, or a graphophone, or a jar of canned peaches—maybe with all of them together—plodding heavily homeward. He is moving and his "homeward" is a new route; he has not trodden this way before, for this is spring and moving time, and the world and his wife are migrating.

Everybody is looking about for a new location, that is, a house with another room and a better furnace and more electric lights and a wider porch and a nicer view and a south front and a basement laundry and a clothes chute and a patent lock on the cellar door and less grass to mow in the front yard.

The bride of last year has a new experience. It's her first move and she isn't used to it. There's too much to look after. She doesn't know how she'll ever get things straightened out. But she tackles the job bravely and bandages up the dining room chairs and stuffs rugs between the pictures and puts tags on the nutmegs and labels the eggs and hopes they won't all get broken or lost in the great shuffle. It's all a bitter dream and she looks forward to the time when they will be happy again in their new home, and mother will wash up things and do the ironing and the mending and run up a few things "I just have to have" on the sewing machine, so that Edythe may sit on the porch with Harold and make him hope heaven after all isn't what it's cracked up to be.

This is spring and moving time. The red gods are calling and the wanderlust is on, harking back to the old migrating instincts of the prehistoric past, when man abandoned winter's cave for a leafy refuge in the silent forest's depths and sat on a limb with a new wife and wished for happier hunting grounds.

However, it is all over after a while, and things get settled down. The lost weights of the grandfather's clock are discovered in the oven, and the stove legs are found buried in the flour bin; the "Bless Our Home" motto hangs once more over the living room door, and peace abides. Harold and Edythe realize they have learned some things, and one of them, and the most important, is to buy a home of their own as soon as possible and have a place to come home to, instead of to move away from every time the green buds shoot and the spring sirens call.

ETHICS AND WORLD PROBLEMS

Ethics cannot be divorced from politics. Ethical and political principles are not eternal truths, but they are rather means towards a goal. Not "the greatest happiness of the greatest number" but "the enduring and highest happiness of the greatest number" should be mankind's aim. We must demand a combination of the democratic and aristocratic principles to promote progress to this goal.

Only on a basis of these formulas can the future be assured of civilization, according to Professor William McDougall in a lecture delivered at Northwestern University. Professor McDougall occupies the chair of psychology at Harvard University and is delivering a series of six lectures at Northwestern on "Ethics and World Problems." He declared that the hope of the world lies in a synthesis of universal and national ethics.

"The democratic and the aristocratic principles are not incapable of being combined," he declared. "History displays for our contemplation certain instances of nations that have achieved such synthesis in imperfect forms; and these instances, imperfect as they were, were yet the most successful that the world has known in promoting progress towards the goal we have defined—the highest happiness of the greatest number enduring through an indefinitely long period."

"I would cite as the best among such instances Greece in its great age, the Roman republic, England in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, America in the days of the founding of the Republic."

"STEVE" TO BE GIVEN AT PRINCESS THEATRE

Eugene O'Brien To Appear For Limited Engagement in Chicago

George M. Gatts, who will present Eugene O'Brien, the world's most idolized stage and screen lover at the Princess theatre, Chicago, for a limited engagement commencing Sunday, April 15th, is a well known Chicago producer, and is very well known locally for the reason that he has presented stock in most every one of the suburban cities, and having achieved a record of putting on good entertainment at all times, his presentation of Eugene O'Brien in a three act stage play can be relied upon for being a clean, wholesome offering, free from smut or sex.

"Steve" is a charming romantic comedy-drama, built on the idea of moving picture making, in which Eugene O'Brien has the role of a moving picture director. He and his company have assembled at Grammy Lube's cottage on an island off the coast of Maine to make a picture.

"Steve" is on the island but a short time when he finds the islanders and their peculiar laws so interesting he recognizes a story that is far better and more human than his original scenario, consequently he uses several of the interesting characters together with his professional players in the new story. It proves a great success, puts the old island on the map, and makes a star out of one of the pretty island girls, making Steve the hero of the day.

George M. Gatts has surrounded Eugene with a most eminent cast chief of which is Mrs. Thomas Whit-
