OIL REFINERY IS INDUSTRIAL CITY
 Varied and Extensive Plants In Each Instance Utilized In Operations

The modern oil refinery is a city of stills, agitators, sweat houses, power plants, machine shops, plant railroads, unloading racks, storage tanks, all underlaid by innumerable pipe lines bringing the crude oil, in some instances, from fields as far as 1,500 miles distant. It is distinguishable at a distance by rows of towering smoke stacks rising from batteries of pressure stills.

There are today in the United States over four hundred refineries, ranging from the small plant which "skins" or "tops" the oil to the complete refinery yielding the entire array of petroleum products. They represent an investment of a billion and a half dollars.

Gasoline is shipped from the refineries in tank cars to bulk distributing stations at central points. In all there are 133,000 tank cars in petroleum service, representing an investment of $266,000,000. From the distributing stations, gasoline is carried by motor truck to tanks at filling stations, garages and roadside pumps.

ABOUT 1,300 GOBS ARE AT GREAT LAKES

Activities at Training Station Booming Since Personnel Increased

Great Lakes naval training station is a regular beehive of activity once more as a result of the resumption of training of recruits, beginning July 1, and at present there are 1,300 recruits on the station, with more coming in at frequent intervals.

This is the largest number of "gobs" that has been on the station since the cessation of hostilities in Europe.

The executive and postoffice departments at the station are experiencing the thrills of the rush of business incidental to the increase in the personnel.
