LOST BASEBALLS IN BIG LEAGUE ITEM

COST THOUSANDS IN YEAR

Fans Carry Off Every Ball That Goes Into Stands As Souvenirs; Plan to Stop This Expense

According to calculations, the sum of $52,424 was lost to the 16 big league clubs last season through the seizure of balls hit into the stands.

The average fan of today has no sense whatever of honesty, so far as a ball is concerned. He thinks he has an absolute right to take a ball that bounces his way, that it is a gross outrage on his personal rights if he has to give it back.

In the old days before the rule was adopted putting a new ball in play every time the old one vanishes or is even scuffed, the fans thought they played a part in the game by throwing back the ball. If the home team was batting and a brand new ball came up in the stand, the fans thought they'd help the home hitters by returning it in a hurry; if the visitors were at bat, the ball would be discolored, probably almost jet black, by the time it got back in the field—but it came back, anyhow. All different nowadays.

Some scheme to save the spheroids would be gladly accepted by the magnates, but there seems no chance to do anything, unless by extending the wire netting all the way around the pavilions. The old Chicago National League club actually did this at its former park—the wire barriers circled the whole arena—but this was really done with the idea of keeping the fans from hopping in the field. Back in 1891, the crowd came upon the field so thickly that a game had to be forfeited one afternoon, and after that the whole line of seats was caged in.

Extension of the wire cages would save lost balls and also protect spectators from injury, but how some of the fans would howl at the idea! These fans say they can't stand looking through the wire—but the hope of grabbing a ball counts a lot more with them than any visual clarity.
