

IMMIGRANTS' FIRST PHONE EXPERIENCE

USE IT AT ELLIS ISLAND

Peculiar Reaction of Newly-Arrived Foreigners Described Some Have Never Seen 'Phone

When the immigrants arrive at Ellis Island many of them have their first experience with the telephone which plays an important part in informing relatives and friends of the new world arrivals.

Placarded with pink and white tickets, denoting the railroad line they are bound for, oozing strangely-shaped bundles all over their persons, with a few small meek-faced children trudging alongside the typical immigrant family, having successfully passed their examination, enters the waiting room ready for the fateful moment of their departure in to the new world proper.

Never Saw Telephone
Some of them have never seen a telephone before. Others have rarely used them, but are as eager as children to try. A telephone booth which has stood in this waiting room for many years is the very first to acquaint hundreds of thousands of immigrants with the service of the nation-wide Bell system.

Sometimes those who speak no English at all may enlist the aid of one of the government employees to get the telephone connection desired. Soon a rapid-fire of Slavonic rapture buzzes over the telephone wires, evidently informing someone's lost mother's second cousin of their safe arrival. Some of them can speak a little English, not well, but loud, as the telephone operators who handle their calls can testify. Most of them have no idea of geography or distance.

Long Distance Calls
Long distance calls, as might be expected, make up a large percentage of those which go out from Ellis Island for, in addition to the calls sent by the immigrants, the officials of the Island must keep in almost constant touch with the Department of Labor in Washington, in order to consult records or to obtain information.

The congressmen may not find much time to make laws this winter, as their attention will be asked to secure jobs for their constituents.

Now that the country has got through hollering for the election, it would be a good idea to shout a little for the good old home town.

PHONE OPERATING IS MEMORY TRAINER

Develops Accurate and Retentive Faculties of Brain, Declares Expert

At the risk of her life during a fire which recently destroyed five business blocks, Miss Mary Crist, telephone operator at Millersport, Ohio, remained at her switchboard and called firemen from nearby towns while the building in which she was located was ablaze. Citizens of the Ohio River village assert that only Miss Crist's devotion to duty prevented the entire business section of the town from being razed by the flames.
