ELECTRIFYING FARM DIFFICULT PROBLEM

EXPECTED IN THE FUTURE

Means Long Transmission Lines And Much Technical Work But Some Day It Will Be Reality

The farms of the United States some day will be electrified. The labor of farming will be made less burdensome through the use of electric power. And while it is true that this power is now being furnished to two and one-half per cent, or 164,347 of the 6,500,000 farms in the country, the problem of supplying rural districts has by no means been solved. There are many difficulties in the way.

Potential User
The farmer is potentially a heavy user of electric power. But he and his neighbor are widely separated, and so far it seems that the expense of getting electric power to him will be considerable.

Long steel electric transmission lines are built across country and to those not familiar with electrical development it seems an easy matter to run a wire off these lines to every farm they happen to cross, to supply the farmer with power.

The lines carry a voltage of from 6,600 to 200,000 volts. In the majority of cases it is most impractical and too expensive to tap a line and reduce the voltage to a degree it can be used on a farm. The cost of reducing it would be prohibitive and in the process of reduction more current would be lost in the transformer than would be used by the farmer.

Feasible Plan
The only feasible plan evident so far seems to be in the building of low voltage lines extended from a transformer substation in a nearby town.

At present, too, the rate is not one to encourage a liberal use of power on the farms, and in some of the experimental areas it has been found that three rural users of power to a mile use less electricity than the average city customer.

That the farms shall be supplied with electric power there is no doubt, but that the use of it on the farm will be greater than in a small business in the city cannot be ascertained. It will be employed for lighting and small power in the home. On the farm to pump water, saw wood, grind feed, milk cows and churn.

The ballots are getting so big in some states that they might use the left-overs for bed quilts.
Having made their mark on the ballots, many citizens should make one on checks paying off their overdue bills.
With the Christmas celebrations only a few weeks away, the kid element is showing interest in the Sunday school lessons.
