A STORY OF POWER

"WILD GEESE"
By Martha Ostenso
Dodd Mead & Co.

"Wild Geese" is a story of power. The power of Nature over men, the power of one's acts over one's self, the power of one human being over others.

Up in the stern relentless country of the Northwest there is little that softens or beautifies human nature. The struggle for existence is so cruel that men become numb to all other things than the unrelenting demands of the soil. Sowing, tending, praying that no terrible wind or frost will destroy the crop, reaping the meagre fruits in the fall, keeping alive during the winter by the sternest economy to start the hopeless cycle again in the spring.

Caleb Gare, a son of this country, has absorbed its cruel and relentless power without any of the beauties which Nature even at its most terrifying has. Years ago, his wife Amelia, had loved a man who died by being gored by a bull. Several months later Amelia gave birth to his son. Caleb Gare, who had loved Amelia and longed to win her, is terribly embittered and decides to vent his passion for her in power. Marrying her, he becomes a perfect demon of cruelty, refining his torment to the most subtle means. Amelia endures everything rather than have her son, Mark Jordan, who has been adopted by a mission, know the shadow across his parentage.

It is Amelia's and Caleb's children who are the sacrifice. Martin, the oldest, who has never known any boyhood, an old man with stooped shoulders and a broken spirit at twenty; Judith a girl as beautiful and unbroken as a young colt, in whom the only spark of rebellion glows; Ellen who is growing blind from lack of the right glasses and who in a sniveling sort of way, enjoys her martyrdom; Carlie, the youngest, an imp whom Caleb plays off against the others.

For Judith the trumpeting of the wild geese, the sound that seems "to hollow out the heavens," gives the challenge for freedom. And through her freedom is found.

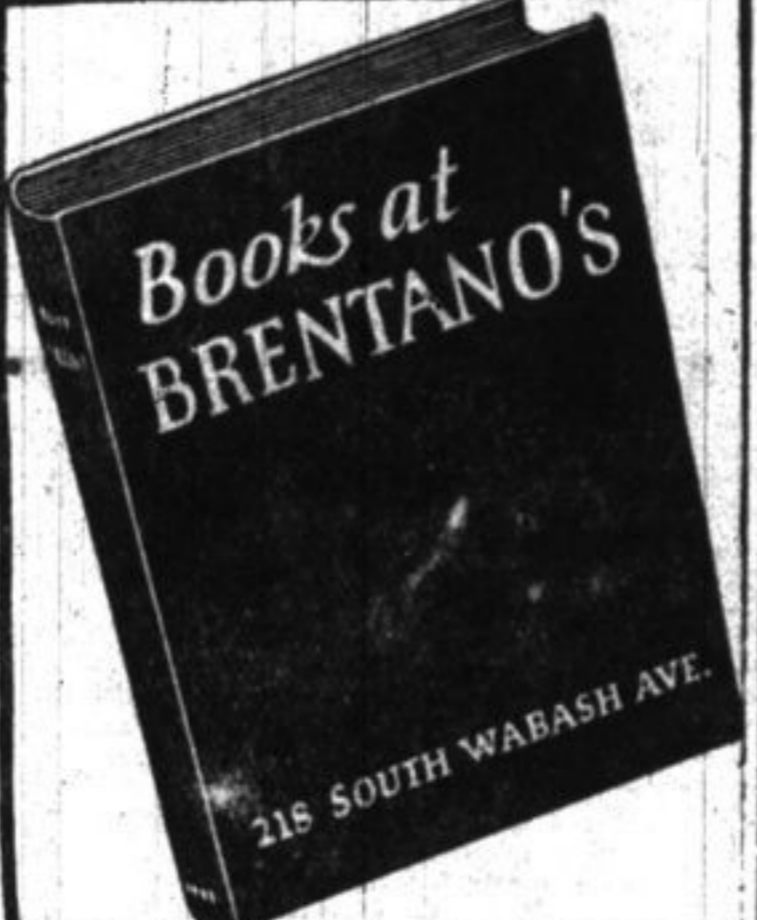

The book is written on a sustained note of tragedy, as poignant as in a symphony can be the reiterated note of a violin. There is something epic in the relentless onward sweeping of the life, although the time covered by the story is only a few months. The feeling for Nature has the deep and primitive quality which marks the best of the Norwegians from whose race Martha Ostenso is sprung.

"High above the soughing of the wind under the great eaves of the stone house, she heard the trailing clangor of the wild geese. Their cry smote upon the heart like the loneliness of the universe... a magnificent seeking through solitude—an endless quest."
