Alone With Jealousy
Perhaps the most poignant ache that comes to the heart of a woman is caused by neglect. Curtiss had hurt me many times by his utter absorption in business and it had been a long time since he had commented on a new gown I was wearing or noticed a change in the way I dressed my hair. But this was a new phase through which my emotions now passed—this realization that was forced upon me that he was able to find pleasure in going about to parties with some other girl. It did not seem to dampen his ardour in the least because I was not always included among the guests.

As I sat alone in the gathering dusk a host of jealous thoughts rushed through my mind. I wondered if he could be falling in love with Letitia Evans. I had heard of such things happening before. He seemed quite carefree and happy when she was near.

Now they had gone off together on a moonlight picnic all alone in the back seat of the long, high-powered car. With just the two couples out there on the mountain they would be thrown together most of the time. Eye Drennen and Bill Gillespie were engaged and would undoubtedly go off moon-gazing leaving Curtiss and Letitia alone. She was pretty too! I recalled exactly how she looked as she stood in the doorway waiting for Curtiss to come out and there was that intangible something about her, too, that appeals to men. Women called it personality or charm, for want of a more definite term. In my jealous mood I interpreted it as studied allure.

Although the heat of the day had been intense a sudden shower just before sunset had left the earth freshly gleaming and just slightly warm. A lilac bush breathed its fragrance into the night and a caressing young breeze wafted it tenderly towards the south. The moonlight, with fingers of love, had smothered out the rough and jagged peaks of Shades mountain beyond and, under her gentle touch, their outlines were black velvet against a distant sky.

Suddenly I yearned for romance with all the enthusiasm of youth. I even fancied a Prince Charming who would come and whisper sweet nothings in my ear. I wanted to be told that I was beautiful and attractive and desirable once more. I longed to be reassured that I was not becoming matronly and uninteresting and old.

What was it Curtiss had said? That I was "always thinking about house-keeping and food."

And what was it Letitia Evans had flung at me as they left on their moonlight ride? That I was "getting too unromantic for words!"

Ah, if they could only have known how eager I was for the very things that they too, were seeking out there on the mountain under the moon! Romance, adventure, companionship, and love.

Curtiss had been absolutely unappreciative of the effort I had made to help him win back the fortune he had lost. Little had he realized what a struggle it was for me to be continually economizing when I had known nothing but luxurious living before we were wed. Then too, I had strenuously endeavored to become the kind of wife he admired most.

the green silk gauze from the window beside my bed and there in the moonlight were Curtiss and a girl—but they were not in the car they had started out in, but Letitia Evans' roadster which she was driving herself.

There was an enveloping stillness and then I heard Curtiss' voice: "But I don't think it's safe; your going home alone."

Then Letitia: "Much safer than your going with me old dear."

Then they both laughed. Letitia had been drinking, for her laughter was strained and high. I had been on a few parties with her myself and I knew when she had had too much.

What could it all mean?

The changed cars, and that she would be much safer alone than with Curtiss seeing her home! I glanced at the little jeweled clock on my bedside table and with swift alarm I noticed that the hands stood at 3 o'clock. More than half the night was gone. A generation ago a young girl out with a married man at that hour would have faced certain disgrace and yet here was this spoiled child of fortune taking no care whatsoever to hide her indiscretion; and boldly laughing and talking as if she cared not a snap of her restless fingers what I, the neighbors should think.

What excuse would Curtiss offer? Curtiss who had always been so dignified and prim.

I remembered my decision to go to New York but for some reason, my plan brought little comfort, and all I could think of was the unconventional scene which I had just witnessed outside.

The light flared up and Curtiss stood beside my bed.
