

JUST PARAGRAPHS

Two remarkable things have happened. A Russian has written a book about Russia and a Tibetan one on Tibet. The former is by Maurice Tindus, and under the title of "Broken Earth," it tells what so many of us have wanted to know, just what headway Communism is making with the peasant in Russia. The other "A Tibetan on Tibet" gives that almost unknown thing, a view of that mysterious country and its customs, thru the eyes of one of its own sons, Paul Sherap.

Lord Dunsany's book, "The Charwoman," published April 16, is a fantastic novel of the Golden Age of Spain. It will be eagerly welcomed by the many Dunsany followers.

SENTIMENTAL BUT GOOD

"THE EXQUISITE PERDITA"

By E. Barrington
DoddMead & Co.

E. Barrington of the extraordinary versatile pen, which throws off a book on Buddhism one day, a tale of Japan the next, and a semi-historical novel or biography under a different name de plume on the next, has found a fitting subject in "The Exquisite Perdita." Perdita of the sentimental age, sentimental herself in the extreme, gives her slightly sentimental biographer a chance to drip honey on every page. Perdita instead of singing "breathes her soul to the moonlight like the nightingale," and instead of looking she "unambushes her eyes," which goes to show that if Perdita was as she is pictured and is now where they read current fiction she is rising up to call her semi-biographer blessed.

But aside from the honey which at times is cloying, the story is good. It is interesting, it makes the characters, while they are a little too good or bad to be quite real, at least amusing, and it paints a vivid picture of the extravagant shallow life of that day in the late seventeen hundreds.

Beautiful Perdita Robinson, coached by Garrick and put forward by Sheridan, makes a brilliant success on the stage. Alas, too brilliant for she catches the eye of the young Prince Charming, future King of England, and is persuaded to become his mistress. From that time on poor Perdita has as many trials as the well remembered "Poor Pauline." And there was no hero waiting to snatch her back from the brink, only a neglected daughter to care for her in the end.

A FLAPPER VAMPIRE

"THE WINDY HILL"

By Jennings Perry
Simon and Shuster

"Beware the flapper, she will get come up with in the end" might be a succinct manner of stating the burden of this moderately good novel, a first one, by Jennings Perry.

But John Starr had no one to sum up the moral for him thus succinctly, so he gravitated to the nymph-like Clita as the moth to the flame. And on the night when throwing off her clothes with the conventions, she danced for him on "The Windy Hill" he mixed her up with all his dreams of beauty and poetry and religion, and leaving for New York the next day, took her name enshrined in his heart.

Then follows a struggle in the hard hearted city and the gradual dimming of the image of Clita. But at last as his success is attained and he is engaged to another girl, Clita arrives. But even now she only trifles with poor John and takes New York, with her dancing, by storm. Then there are men and men, and more men getting mixed in her light until at last a murder burns one up and nearly extinguishes the flame. And for a little while Clita almost wishes she had married John. But John doesn't, at least not if he has learned anything during his years in the big city—and the book ends on a note of sweet melancholy.

It is announced from New York that Mr. Ziegfeld intends to push the blonde chorus girls into the back row. But the trouble will be to make 'em stay there.

An Egyptian prophet told an English minister that something of great moment in the world's history would occur on July 20 and London was disappointed when nothing happened. But it isn't too late yet. Maybe a future Babe Ruth or Walter Johnson was born on that day.
