SEEKING POSSIBLE OIL SUBSTITUTES

The country has been hearing about possible substitutes for oil and gasoline for many years, but there has been so much said and so little done about this subject that automobilists have become skeptical and have lost interest. However there is now reason for hope that something will eventually result from the experiments that are being made throughout the country. The encouraging news is given out by the Federal Oil Conservation board at Washington that it "is studying new and important data relating to the general problems of the oil industries." One phase of the forthcoming report will treat with conditions attending the development of oil shale and the possible substitutes.

RUM TRADE LOSING IN PORT OF HALIFAX

MANY VESSELS QUITTING

U. S. Coast Guard Activities are Making It Poor Business, According to Report From There

The week ending October 16, was the first in the history of rum running off the United States coast, that there has not been a rum running vessel of some description in Halifax harbor. This is attributed directly to the activities of the American rum runner chasers patrolling the American coast, says a dispatch from Halifax.

This information was unofficially given out here yesterday, and it was also learned that a least half the craft which operated in the rum running game out of Halifax last year are now permanently out of the business, while at the same time, many of the Lunenburg fishing schooners, at one time engaged in the business, either directly or chartered, have returned to the fishing industry. It is understood that there is only one Lunenburg vessel at present under charter in the rum traffic.

Shipments Reduced
Customs officials in Halifax are of the opinion that not half the liquor, previously shipped through this port, as a base of supplies, is now being sent out of here.

Records of shipping show that at least half the vessels and steamers that were in the rum running business last year are out of the game entirely, so far as Halifax is concerned. It has been known for some time that there was a very material decrease in the number of schooners chartered out of Lunenburg.

There is some talk of a very great disappointment in the business a very great disappointment in the business, talking openly with the regard to the business, some of the leading men in the trade have frankly stated to your reporter that the game today, in view of the activities of the United States rum chasers, is not "worth the candle."

Diverted to Other Uses
Records available in Halifax show that on September 1, 1925, there were eight steamers and eighteen schooners out of Halifax, supplying American rum row, and on September 1, of that year, they were in port. Since then, four of the steamers have gone out of business; one is laid up because of no charter, one is for sale, and one has been seized; so that right, only one is in the business today.

Of the eighteen schooners, nine have gone out of business, one has been laid up indefinitely; one has entirely disappeared and the rest are still in the business.

There is in Halifax today only one large company actually under authority to do an export business from here. Those men remaining in the business are principally members of a "ring," highly capitalized and able to stand losses. They have adopted the method of sending out smaller vessels, instead of the large steamers that were once in the game, and that method provides a certain protection as in the event of capture a much smaller amount of liquor is involved.

New Bases
There has been a certain amount of business transferred from Halifax to St. Pierre, and St. John's Newfoundland, for what reason it is not quite clear, and these two places, which were earlier in the business and used very largely as a base, then dropped for a while, are apparently coming back more or less in favor with the rum runner. At the same time what is happening at Halifax is a clear indication and proof that the recent American methods for combating rum running off that coast, is having very definite results, and has practically broken down, at least for the time, the whole trade which operated with this port as its base.

Where of late there has not been a rum runner in port for a week at a time, it was not an uncommon thing a year ago to see twenty of them lying in the harbor in one day.

Strict Regulations
While in Canada there is no federal prohibition law, the national government of this country is getting very strict with regard to Canadian vessels smuggling into Canada, and there is a distinct effort to co-operate with American authorities for the enforcement of their law. For instance Canadian vessels are not allowed to clear for destinations, with rum cargoes, unless they are genuinely destined for such ports as those for which they clear.
