

FAMOUS PICTURES OF LIFE AT SEA DISPLAYED AT INSTITUTE

Canvases of William Ritschel Now Exhibited Fascinating Glimpses of Life on Ocean Wave

How fascinating is a life on the ocean wave, with the lungs filled with the freshest air, where the eye may drink in the colors of sea and sky; where the mind is free to roam and the soul is bathed in the radiance of God's great outdoors.

His exhibition of some twenty-three pictures opened at the Art Institute Tuesday last and will be continued until January 24. Of the paintings the one showing the great sailing ship plowing through a school of porpoises is remarkable for this feeling of freshness, for the feeling of a certain tang in the salt air which fills the belying sails to the bursting point.

The painter has achieved a remarkable sense of a forward and upward movement in this picture, for the great vessel, one feels, is shooting ahead with tremendous energy. On either side of this painting Ritschel shows likenesses of girls native to the South Sea Islands, dusky beauties scantily clothed, yet living in a land of vivid color.

A stormy, rock bound coast is seen in No. 1, which hangs on the west wall. Here the anger of the sea is sensed, as the storm gathers force. The sullen sky is grayed down to one solid color, as threatening as an angry gather with a birch whip. You can see the repressed bosom of the ocean as it shrinks under the lash of the wind and sends up little whimpers of protest, showing in stinging spray. And No. 9, showing some of the storm beaten cypress trees of the west coast, has a quality in it of restrained color that is real art.

You sense the gallant struggle these gnarled monarchs are making as they bend beneath the trade winds and thrust their branches out in despairing gestures. Then there is the derelict, riding in the trough of the sunset sea, with a world of loneliness expressed in the abandoned, shipwrecked vessel.

COSTS U. S. HUGE SUM TO PRESERVE PATENTS Thousands of Models Submitted By Inventors; Not Required To Do So Now

A nation's industrial history could be written in its patent office, but in this country the historian might be embarrassed with the wealth of his source material. Up to 1880 the law required applicants for patents to submit models, with the result that the patent office received 155,000 models. To take care of this collection since 1884 has cost the government more than $200,000.

By way of reducing the expense of care-taking, the congress has authorized a commission "to select such of the Patent Office models and exhibits as may be deemed to be of value and of historical interest and cause the remainder of said models and exhibits to be disposed of by public auction, gift to federal, state, or private museums or institutions, or returned without expense by the government to the original depositors or their representatives, where demanded in writing by them."

Among the models are the first telephone, the first sewing machine, and other epochal devices. From them was created a new world of comforts and conveniences for the benefit of mankind. With the substance of those models is embalmed the fertile ingenuity of Americans of the long ago, but their works are no less significant of these times, when every day something's done that couldn't be done.

TRAFFIC SIGNALS STANDARDIZED, PLAN Urged That Same Type of Signals for Same Order Be Used Generally

Accidents will happen to the best of motorists, but the odds against them will be less when traffic signals are standardized throughout the country. In that belief several highway and engineering organizations have agreed on a code to include the use of luminous and nonluminous signs and signals.

Three colors have been selected for primary traffic control: Red to stop, yellow for caution, and green to proceed. Careful experience showed that at a distance the red signal lights were most easily distinguished from other colors, and require the lowest light intensity for unmistakable recognition. A red light of 75 candle power could be distinguished at 600 feet, on the average, but a green light had to be of 250 candle power, a yellow light required 750, and a blue light 1,000 candle power.

The use and significance of traffic signals should become so familiar that they would promptly cause the desired reaction from motorists, advises the Nation's Business. But efficiency of the signals depends on the color sense, and color blindness is common among men, doctors say, although it is a rarity among women. That conclusion may explain why women never miss a bright bit of color in a show window, be it hat, gown, or lingerie. But it doesn't explain the wear and tear caused by folks who see red all the time. The hue and cry over the traffic problem has had expression in all sorts of slogans. Why not "Be sure your colors are right, then go ahead?"

KING OF SIAM LIKED THE BRIGHT LIGHTS

The late King of Siam, Rama, proved himself the greatest enthusiast yet discovered on the subject of electric lighting, according to a report of the Siamese Budget committee which is settling his finances.

In a land where the sun shines daily and where smoke and fogs are practically unknown, the royal bill for electric lighting the palace at Bangkok and other residences amounted to $187,500 a year, or more than $500 a day.

The present King of Siam, it is said, expects to reduce this item of his household economy.

Being urged to go in for more home life, the family all stay at home anyway while the Christmas gifts are being distributed.
