All activities of the children of the DeForest school have focused during this week upon ways and means in which to serve children in the Mississippi flood area. The destructive phases were gripping the imagination of many of the children to such an extent as to establish fear of water. The staff of the school realized that another outlet must be provided whereby activity and purpose would center around constructive service. Some children suggested sending money they thought they might earn. The idea was taken up by the little school and the final decision reached, was to make candies and cakes in school, announce a sale and invite friends to become the purchasers. They not only were able to send $10.55 to the National Red Cross, but they have had many vital experiences in this bit of co-operative service. These include handling of money, making change, getting a bank draft, all of which made simple problems in arithmetic very real. Processes involved in cooking as to measuring, mixing, and baking made one child say, "I wish we could eat these cakes and sell them too." To arrange their wares attractively created great interest and to sell them was most stimulating. Not only have the children found a way in which to serve others, but they have also had their attention focused on the hope of mankind to so guide the power inherent in riverways and currents that they will be used for good.
