ECONOMICALLY SPEAKING

Former Secretary of Commerce Shows How Products of one Country Affect Industry in Others

William C. Redfield, former Secretary of Commerce, in Nation's Rusiness Magazine, says:

Probably less than one-half of one per cent of us know that the 200,000. 000 or more pairs of artificial silk hosiery, the millions of yards of rayon fabrics, and the tires for the automobiles which transport the wearers of the hosiery around the United States are responsible for an era of agricultural prosperity in Egypt unequaled since the days of the Pharachs, while no more than that realize that the present disturbances in China adversely affect every American user of paint.

Closely Related Yet these widely separated industrial or political causes and effects, with other hundreds like them, are often as closely related as the economic phenomena of a small town unit. The great fabric of interdependent international interests, with dramatic-who can say? its far-flung threads of supply and a result of changing conditions, po- tic mood, slays. tries nor men can live any more "un-prosperity and the wide use of artificial silk products and automobile tires, although the respective economic phenomena are thousands of miles apart, is easily explained. Long staple cotton, grown most successfully in the valley of the Nile, is an important fiber in the manufacture of synthetic silk, now widely known as rayon. It also is used in the manufacturing of automobile tires.

Another Example Chinese wood oil, or tung oil, on the other hand, is the base of most of modern waterproof, quick-drying varnishes, and is also in printing ink. While only a small quantity of it was imported into this country a decade ago, over a hundred million pounds are required in American industries each year now. In fact, there is hardly a home in the United States 11 that is not indirectly affected by the shortage in this product due to the political disturbances at Hankow, China, where this oil is made in shipped to all parts of the world.

"WOO" POPULAR NAME AMONG THE CHINESE

Common There As "Smith" Is In United States, According to Directories

Eveidently Mr. Woo is the Chinese Mr. Smith.

A writer in a recent issue of the Telephone Engineer, who has just returned from an extended trip through the Orient, says that the name "Woo" is as common in Chinese telephone directories as the name "Smith" is in the directories in this country. All sorts of Woo's are listan wants day work; can furnish good refer- ed. In the Shanghai telephone directory, for example, there are as many SITUATION WANTED-Day work or reg. as forty "Woo Kung Kwan's" and as many different addresses.

One of the real advantages of the Merle Thorpe in Nation's Business agricultural agitation is that the

They understood it was an accepted fact, but just how the authorities had decided it was a basic industry was beyond their vision. Today genuinely, sincere and intelligent expressions on the farm situation can be heard in all the eastern territory, and contrary to a thought which has been industriously promulgated, the eastern interest in the solution of the farm problem is not predicated on a mere dollar and cents view, but because of an honest and sympathetic Luck? Hardly. An intangible feeling of distress over the struggles something, often scarcely sensed by which many farmers have been
