HOME-MADE CANDLES BECOME POPULAR

With the practical disappearance of the good old guild of candle-makers in America, housewives with limited expense accounts are turning to the home manufacture of perfumed tapers which have recently become such a rage with hostesses.

And the modern home-made candles strangely are better and more appropriate to the sections in which they are made than the bayberry candles which heretofore graced holiday tables, says Farm & Fireside. The difficulty in securing these candles and their high price led to experiments with ordinary paraffin and the oils of native plants such as peppermint, wintergreens, cedars, junipers, prunella and pennyroyal. The wax is melted and scented with the aroma desired and weighted wicks dipped into the containers until the desired thickness is secured. Although an absolutely smooth surface may not result, this is not necessary with candles for festive purposes.

Another advantage of the home-made candles is that colors harmonizing with decorations may be had and the scents made absolutely true to nature. Many women of modest means, adds the article, have found candle making to be an excellent method of increasing holiday pin-money as they are in great demand at the shops during the holiday seasons.
