DWARF FRUIT TREES FOR THIS VICINITY

Urges Planting as Experiment Here; Tells of Success in Growing

Since we should never plant fruit trees unless we intend to spray them at the necessary intervals it is proper to talk of spraying first, especially that now is the time to spray to rid our trees and shrubs of scale. Until leaf buds start to break one can safely use the "dormant strength" spray solution which is most effective. After that the "summer spray" must be used to safeguard injury to foliage but this is only one fifth the strength. Lime-sulphur solution is the standard spray for scale. Our hardware stores handle the material in one and five pound cans, the label on each can giving the necessary information as to application, etc. Stems and branches infested with scale should be sprayed until the liquid drips from the branches. It is intended to smother the scale insects and unless a good coating adheres to the bark the spray will not be effective.

In our area the gray dogwood, whether planted on lawns or growing wild in its native situation seems to be most violently attacked by the scale. Next in susceptibility seems to be the elm trees but several other species of trees and shrubs harbor the pest. Sometimes heroic treatment is needed. Last June one fine young elm in full leaf seemed to be dying when examination showed only an acute attack of scale. Spraying on a mild solution seemed too gentle a treatment, so a stout scrub brush dipped into a pan of lime-sulphur solution was brought into action and the scale scrubbed off and the bark thoroughly coated. Within three weeks the tree was again in normal condition.

If orders for fruit trees are not in now, they should not longer be deferred. Here is a word of good cheer for the small lot owner. He has room for fruit trees if he will select dwarf trees. One can now get almost any well known variety of fruit trees in dwarf stock and several such trees can be grown in the space necessarily given to one stand ard tree. Let us give a few talking points in favor of dwarf stock.

Dwarf fruit trees, apples, peaches, pears, cherries, etc., can be grown in bush form, six or eight feet high, or trained against a building, fence or trellis. They come into bearing in nearly half the time of the standard varieties. They can be sprayed without difficulty. They can be covered over to offset a belated frost. They will produce large and perfect fruit, although, of course, not as much as the very much larger standard trees. In England, France, Germany and elsewhere dwarf trees are regularly planted on small lots. Not the least important consideration is that dwarf trees are distinctly trees for amateurs and lots of fun can be had working with them. There are fine educational possibilities here.

Can we raise our own fruit in Highland Park? There have been some notable successes, and plenty of failures. Perhaps most of the latter have been due to lack of care. Mr. R. R. Raymote who recently lectured here before representatives of our garden clubs and others things we can make a success of it. He has over 200 dwarf fruit trees in his very successful experimental orchard of about one third of an acre near Sawyer, Michigan. He uses dwarf trees for hedges and to separate garden walks. Most of his stock has been obtained from the Van Dusen Nurseries in Geneva, New York. And now for a suggestion: Why not give dwarf stock a very general try-out in Highland Park? The writer has three bush trees on his small lot and proposes to plant several for training along a fence. If a number of us take part in the experiment, it will be quite feasible to employ an expert to come once a year to check us up on pruning and spraying. A public record of plantings and results would in time be very valuable. We will soon send in an order for trees from Elm Place School and will be glad to include any other orders, each to share in the necessary expense, no margin-of-profit to be included. Any one can order direct from the above named nursery or other good nurseries carrying dwarf stock. The Van Dusen catalogue is worth filing for its cultural directions.—Jesse L. Smith.

The philosophers tell us to live the simple life, but many say that their creditors won't allow them to do so. Some people think sports take up too much attention, but countries where there are no ball tossers are apt to have bomb throwers.
