LOCAL AFFAIRS

The progress of a city depends to a large extent on whether the mass of the people take an interest in the development of that city.

Some people don't seem any more interested in the suggestions made for the advance of their home town, than if they were hearing about such ideas for some place hundreds of miles away.

And there are many in this city who feel that as citizens they are affected by every good proposition for community development, and they are eagerly watching such movements and discussing their pros and con. They rightly realize that when a city develops, it helps everyone who has a job or owns property or a business there or who wants to find work there. We are all tied together as members of a community where we have a lot of identical interests, and if we will talk in favor of those interests and keep watch of their progress and assist if possible, we shall all be the gainers.
