BATTLE TO SAVE LIFE OF LINEMAN IS FUTILE

The fight made by a life saving corps of the Public Service company to restore life in the inanimate form of Robert Ayersman, aged 30, who was electrocuted in the substitution of the company at Lake Bluff, last week ended when attending physicians declared that beyond all doubt life was extinct in the body of the man. The members of the corps had worked ceaselessly for five hours in an effort to revive the victim.

Ayersman, an employe of the Public Service company for twelve years, accidentally touched a wire carrying 33,000 volts.

A crew regarded as experts in use of the prone method of resuscitation, was hurriedly dispatched to the station from the district headquarters of the company in Waukegan. Dr. M. J. Rissinger of Lake Forest were summoned. All took part in the fight to restore life to the victim.

PROHIBITION

Not in behalf of drinkers do I uphold the anti-Prohibition cause, but rather in behalf of those who are annoyed by the results of Prohibition in the lives and well-being of those near and dear to them.

A drinker, during Prohibition, is much like a child deprived of a toy which possesses a harmful feature. When the toy was always within his reach, he didn't care so much for it, but, immediately upon being deprived of it, he longs for it, and searches for it despite any and all handicaps.

Drinking is wrong when indulged in to excess, and drunkenness results. Since adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment, people know that, in drinking, they are lawless; therefore, people otherwise law-abiding cannot feel the consolation of knowing that they are abiding by the law perfectly. The advent of Prohibition caused drinkers to associate with lawless and altogether inferior, unworthy characters.

Prohibition has inaugurated the reign of gangsters, rum-runners, bootleggers and other organizations of people opposing the law. Why bring on a state of affairs such as this? When enacting a Law—or planning so to do—consideration must be given to the welfare of the common majority—not to the gratification of the whims of a few.

The members of the Anti-Saloon League are, no doubt, natural abstainers, that is to say they possess a natural distaste for liquor. Therefore, they proposed the adoption of the Prohibition Law. Is that just?

Because another does not swear or chew tobacco, should he propose the enactment of a law opposing those faults? Would that be just? It would be as just as the Prohibition Law!

Any Law which tends to forfeit or lessen the import of the Provisions as set forth in the Declaration of Independence is not a true Law. A true Law has an uplifting, not a deteriorating, effect.

No-one abhors drunkenness, and harm resulting from drink, to a more decided extent than the writer. Nevertheless, I know that I am only one of the millions of people on earth, and, therefore, it is only just that I consider both sides of the question.

The only thing that is going to conquer drunkenness and all wrong is development of mind to a sufficiently correct extent to prove to Humanity the irrevocable un-progressiveness of error.

True Progress is not superficial. Conventionality and farce do not enter into its make-up.

The enactment of the Prohibition Law has resulted in causing things in general to seem better, though, in reality, it is 'cleaning the floor by covering up the dirt.'

The way to correct faultiness is to counsel the individual on the inefficacy of error, for the mind rules all, and the mind, in order to rule rightly, must be possessive of material conducive to righteousness. Such being the case, it is a step forward in the cause of true righteousness to oppose that which seeks to frustrate the Progress of Truth.

The question under discussion, however, is not drink, but rather the desirability of the Eighteenth Amendment as a prohibitory law. Is it accomplishing its purpose?

A law, to be a true law, should bring about Peace, not discord. A law, to be a true law, should create law-abiders, not law-violators. A true law, by its very existence, should increase respect for law, and not lessen the respect for law previously possessed.

The writer abhors drink and drunkenness, but that is no suitable reason for upholding the Eighteenth Amendment. If drink, and consequent drunkenness, could be permanently abolished by passage of a prohibitory law,—without creating in its stead a worse evil—the writer would be in perfect accord with such law. But, since the un-deniable proof is of a contradictory nature, such Law it to be opposed before it obtains a foothold!
