ALASKAN REINDEER MEAT OF FOOD VALUE

Survey Shows it to Be Rich in Protein, Says Report in Magazine

To determine the value of Alaskan reindeer meat for food, samples have been officially tested recently for chemical composition and nutritive value. It was found to possess high protein, low fat, and comparatively low moisture. The test is valuable in connection with the commercial introduction into the United States of reindeer as an article of food, as well as for the information of Alaskan natives, for whom reindeer meat provides a staple article of food.

Two departments of the Government are co-operating in the study and the analyses and experiments followed a meeting in Washington between representatives of several bureaus of the Department of Agriculture and a representative of the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Education, the governmental agency charged with the promotion of the reindeer industry in connection with the educational work among Alaskan natives. Further experiments will be conducted, and results of the completed study will be incorporated in a popular bulletin on the cooking of reindeer meat, similar to bulletins on the cooking of beef and lamb.—School Life.
