FOREST CONSERVATION

The people of the United States are steadily becoming more interested in the problem of forestry from the ethical and the economic standpoint. They realize that our forests must be preserved and cultivated, not only for their beauty but because they form an important link in the chain of our economic welfare. Despite the fact that we are using steel and concrete in larger quantities each year, lumber is still necessary for a great many purposes and perhaps will always be essential for the comfort and welfare of humanity. Forests also, in certain parts of the country, may play an important part in flood-control problems, and it is maintained by many scientists that trees have something to do with our climate.

From the economic standpoint perhaps the forest is most important just now because it affords an opportunity to take up a great deal of our idle land, not only in Wisconsin and other pine tree states, but in other sections of the country, where there is land available for trees that is practically worthless for any other purpose. Now if a great deal of our poorer land is set aside for forests, it naturally follows that the farmers who work and develop the better agricultural land will have a better chance to make money. Taking a certain number of acres out of cultivation only adds to the value of the land which remains under cultivation. And best of all, the forest land will in time pay for itself and pay good dividends in the bargain.
