FOILING THE PEDDLER

Foiled by the consistent efforts of newspapers generally to make a dent in the average city or good-sized village peddlers are now infesting the country districts where the dangers of patronizing the itinerant merchant have not been as forcibly set forth. There was a time when "Bohemian oats" and lightning rods" went well out in the hinterlands, but with the coming of the rural mail, the telephone and the family newspaper the crooks have been kept busy revising their stock in trade with which to snare the unwary. It is true there are legitimate peddlers who knock at your door, but they are generally the representatives of well-known firms in your community, but for every legitimate peddler who rings the door bell there are a dozen seeking an opportunity to unload poor merchandise at a high price. Don't be afraid to satisfy your doubts as to their honesty before you buy. The average peddler has a game that the customer can only beat by consistently refusing to buy.

MORE HORSES

It is hardly to be expected that so modern a business analyst as Roger Babson would seriously advise people looking for opportunity to go into the business of raising horses. Yet he has just done this very thing. Horse breeders agree that horses are still needed, and good horses are getting scarce because their breeding has been neglected in the last few years. It will take several years more, one breeder says, to make up the present shortage. The farmers, it is said, will always need them to supplement the tractor. Cartage companies and some other forms of business still find them useful in the city, and may continue to do so. Horses are increasingly demanded for riding and racing. Few motorists, however, will grow enthusiastic about any efforts to increase or renew the horse population. Horses are a nuisance on city streets, and little better on country roads. They may be crowded out of all but remote backwoods regions, not because they can no longer serve a useful purpose in the economic scheme, but because they interfere with mechanical traffic in an age of high speed.

You know that most fires start because folks are just plain careless. Folks are that way with tires, too. If they would be careful in buying their tires—come in and get Horseshoes—they would not be alarmed when they saw a bad stretch of road. These Horseshoe Tires are as tough as a 3-11 fire.
