FRANKLIN DISCOVERED GULF STREAM IN 1769

While in London Learned of It Through Captains of American Ships

Discovering the Gulf Stream in London is one of the contributions by Benjamin Franklin to science which has only now been attributed to him. Franklin's study of what has since been called "the grandest and most mighty of any terrestrial phenomena," resulted from the consistent beating by American ships in 1769 of west bound British ships, according to the American Magazine for September.

Franklin heard complaints of British packets being beaten by heavily laden American freighters and, upon being questioned by the British, he took up the question with a Nantucket whaling captain. The captain expressed the belief that there was a "stream" running across the Atlantic with such force that it could cause a difference of speed of seventy miles a day even with a favorable wind.

The old whaler charted the flow of the current in the ocean and Franklin named it the Gulf Stream and stated that he believed the main cause of it to be the wind, with differences in temperatures, salinity, atmospheric pressure and rotation of the earth as auxiliary aids.

Study of the stream continues constantly, the government Hydrographic office having dropped or caused to be dropped more than 10,000 specially prepared bottles containing records into the stream. The drifting of wrecked vessels also aids the study of the stream, one derelict having been carried back and forth across the west Atlantic for three years and six days.

Scientists have referred to the stream as the greatest warm water heating plant in the world and estimate that without it Northern Europe would be an Arctic waste.
