EUROPEAN CATHEDRALS AS MODELS FOR SHOPS

Idea of Rochester Woman Is Regarded as Unique and Practical

European cathedrals have been made the models for factories and the Alhambra, one of Spain's greatest castles, a model for the home of Miss Kate Gleason, of Rochester, N. Y., by a series of circumstances which have brought her a fortune. Her father, owner of a small machine shop, enlisted the aid of his daughter who had shown an inclination for engineering after his eldest son died and his business war hard hit by a national depression, says The American Magazine. Miss Gleason advised her father to drop the tool-making business and take up gear manufacturing. She was the first to seek business in foreign fields and was successful. On one of her trips she saw the Alhambra and decided to have a house that resembled it. This accomplished, she helped her father perfect gear planing machinery which gave a definite upturn to their world-wide trade. New factory buildings became necessary but while they were in project Miss Gleason's father died. She remembered that he had once stood in a European cathedral and remarked that it would be an ideal place for traveling cranes. Accordingly, she sent for plans of various cathedrals and selected one from Pisa as a factory model. The result was one of the most important steps in years in factory construction. Miss Gleason has retired but still builds model homes in East Rochester. She travels widely and recently converted a chateau at Septmont, France, into an A. E. F. war memorial.
