Mrs. Cora Wylie Now Is in State Hospital, Following Inquisition

Mrs. Cora Wylie, 34, of Highland Park, who a week ago took her two sons, Bobbie, 6, and James, 11, into the kitchen of her home where she turned on the gas stove that resulted in the death of the youngest child, on Tuesday was adjudged insane by a commission of physicians in county court.

The mother, shortly after, was removed to the state sanitarium at Elgin.

Testimony from her husband, James, a motorman on the North Shore line, and other relatives revealed the fact that she had been perfectly normal prior to the tragedy except for excessive worrying over minor matters, according to the Waukegan Sun, which says:

Mrs. Wylie declared that her memory, prior to ripping a rubber hose from an attachment, was blank.

"When I was in the hospital I tried to recall what I did but my mind was a blank. Neighbors tell me that I played the piano and the radio but I have not memory of it," she declared.

Appears Normal

Except for the grief she stifled she appeared normal mentally.

Her chief worry that evening had been over the discovery that her son, James, had taken a bicycle belonging to someone else and had used it two days before returning it.

She talked with the boy that night and was greatly depressed over his action, she advised the commission.

She remembered undressing them for bed but did not recall writing three letters, two to relatives and one to Chief of Police Edward Moroney, of Highland Park, in which the disposition of the bodies were dictated.

In those letters she stated that she was not insane.
