The tournament was begun the first of May under the direction of Miss King, one of the girls' gym teachers. The names of those wishing to enter were put in a hat, and as the names were drawn they represented the rungs of the ladder. Marjorie Ingram's name was the first one drawn, and as yet her position remains unchallenged. The contestants can raise their position by challenging another girl whose name is no more than three rungs before hers. The winner then exchanges places with the loser.

Students buy their own lessons from a correspondent school and do the work at the Benton Harbor school. They may work on their project as fast as they desire. When they finish their project, they send it back to the correspondent school, where the school pays for the corrections necessary. These various subjects offer high school credit, providing the work is satisfactory.
